Mr. JONAS. I answer the question by denying in toto that the republicans ever had a majority in that Legislature elected by the people or according to the constitution and laws of the State. I deny in toto that they ever organized that Legislature, and I assert that the democratic speaker of the Legislature and the democratic officers were elected by a majority of properly elected members upon the floor.

Mr. HOAR. But who had the majority of the certificates?

Mr. JONAS. Whether they asked General De Trobriand to come in or not, whether they invited in a Trojan horse or not, whether they asked General De Trobriand's assistance for the purpose of simply preserving order and peace, he did come on that occasion bearing the authority of the Government of the United States to subvert the organization of the Legislature and to drive the speaker from the chair and the members from their seats.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman state who had a majority of the certificates?

Mr. JONAS. I decline to be interrupted any more or to be questioned. The honorable gentleman will find his side of the question presented in the report of a committee of the House of which he was a member——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. JONAS. And that never has had any effect upon the country. I say, Mr. President, that this was the way in which the government was subverted in 1875, and it was done by the inevitable soldier; and the soldiers that the gentleman says the speaker of the house invited in, those soldiers had been quartered in the vicinity of the state-house, they had been aligned in front of the state-house for several hours, perhaps days, previous to the meeting of the Legislature. There was a committee of the House sent down to New Orleans to investigate the matter, and the honorable member from Massachusetts was a member, and the honorable President of this body, the Vice-President of the United States, was a member of that committee, and that committee, though republican, reported by a majority condemning this interruption of the proceedings of the Legislature, condemning the mode in which General De Trobriand ousted the speaker and ousted members of the Legislature, and reported also that the returning board had not made a fair count and declaration of the result of the election.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator permit me about four words?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. JONAS. For a question.

Mr. HOAR. I desire simply to correct a misstatement of fact in regard to myself and Mr. Wheeler. The committee of which we were members approved emphatically every act of the soldiers on that occasion in our report.

Mr. JONAS. Not the committee. The gentleman may have done so, but the majority of the committee disapproved of the act which had been done. The best proof that the Vice-President did not approve of what had been done is that he concocted the celebrated compromise which bears his name; that he came to the city of New Orleans with other members of the committee and organized a new legislature by taking a slate and pencil or a sheet of paper and entering into a calculation as to what members should be permitted to sit and what members should be excluded from their seats, and the legislature thus made up assembled thereafter and maintained its authority; but it was not a legislature elected by the people; but a legislature created and counted in by the Wheeler committee and known as the Wheeler compromise legislature.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does my colleague mean to say that that legislature was not elected by the people?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. JONAS. What for?

Mr. KELLOGG. Do I understand my colleague to say that the legislature formed under what was called the Wheeler adjustment was not chosen by the people?

Mr. JONAS. Some of them were not elected by the people. The members from Caddo were defeated by the people by over five hundred majority, and the true representatives from Caddo were ejected from their seats.

Mr. KELLOGG. You mean the democratic members?

Mr. JONAS. They were ejected from their seats, though elected by the people.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask my colleague what is the relative strength of the colored and white registration, respectively, in Caddo Parish?

Mr. JONAS. That is the old argument of color. I contend that a majority of the colored people of Louisiana and throughout the South are democrats and vote with the democratic party, and I contend that a large number have always done so in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague spoke a moment ago of the election of 1868. In Caddo Parish at that election there was but one republican vote cast.

Mr. JONAS. I cannot be interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Senator from Louisiana declines to be further interrupted, and the Chair suggests to Senators to address themselves to the Chair in order that it may be understood whether the Senator on the floor is willing to yield or not.

Mr. JONAS. The next election, Mr. President, was the election of 1876, the election for electors of President and for State officers. Still troops were scattered throughout the State, still troops were quartered in the cities, still troops were quartered in the barracks, and we had a new form of outrage protected by troops. Finding that the democratic majority was so large that it could not be overcome, the other side devised a system by which they sought to disfranchise a large portion of the citizens of New Orleans. Some eight thousand or ten thousand sewing-machine circulars were scattered throughout the city, sent to various addresses where people formerly had lived and were supposed not then to live, and these circulars not being received and being returned "not found," as intended, from the post-office, some eight thousand affidavits were issued by a United States commissioner for the arrest of citizens of New Orleans immediately preceding the election, and these citizens were all arrested on a charge of false registration, of registering from houses and districts and dwellings where they did not reside, the only evidence of such false registration being that a certain circular had been sent to John Smith at such a street and was returned "not found," John Smith having moved since the last registration. John Smith was immediately arrested under an affidavit in the United States court for a violation of the election laws and for false registration, and in that way some seven or eight thousand people were arrested, and it was proposed to strike some seven or eight thousand of names from the voting list. Among them were many of the best citizens of New Orleans; among them were men who had lived and voted in that city for twenty or thirty years. One of them was a gentleman now sitting in the House of Representatives, a native of the State of Louisiana and a resident of the city for many years. The object was, as I said, to strike these names from the registration list, the registration being completely in the control of the republican party, and thus reduce the democratic majority in New Orleans so largely as to insure the defeat of the party in the State, and all this was done, like every other act of outrage, under the protection of United States marshals backed by United States bayonets.

The officer then in command at New Orleans, of whom I do not wish to speak except with the most extreme respect, because I know he was disposed to do everything that he could for the protection and benefit of the people, and desired to enforce upon them no order unjust, unnecessary, or arbitrary, was under orders during the whole of that period to use his military force to preserve order not merely at the polls but throughout the city and the State, and the preservation of order meant the subversion of the party antagonistic to the republican party should they attempt to oppose any law, any regulation, or any act of those having control of the State government of Louisiana or having control of the election. The sewing-machine dodge had its desired effect, and deprived the democratic party of several thousand votes.

In spite of this we carried the State of Louisiana again by some seven or eight thousand majority. We elected our governor and we elected the democratic electoral ticket, but the returning board appeared again, and our people were compelled by the presence of bayonets and the knowledge that bayonets were present for the purpose of protecting that returning board, to stand still and see fraud perpetrated again, with the difference this time that in addition to seeking to deprive the people of Louisiana of the lawfully constituted officers whom they had chosen, it deprived the people of the United States of the President they had elected. This time the prize was not simply the paltry State of Louisiana; the prize was the presidential chair; and the electoral votes of Louisiana were necessary to be stolen from the democratic candidate in order to elect the Chief Magistrate who now sits in the White House; and this was perpetrated with the aid of the Army.

.The State passed into the hands of its people after a long interregnum—passed into the hands of its people because its people had determined that if the government which they had elected was to be again subverted it must be subverted by Federal bayonets; and because the bitter experience of 1874 and 1875 had been such that President Grant and President Hayes, his successor, both declined to again install a government by the use of Federal bayonets. The Nicholls government was inaugurated, and when its supreme court was appointed, and when that supreme court was installed in lawful authority——

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Does the Senator allude to the judges who now constitute the supreme court of Louisiana?

Mr. JONAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. How were they inaugurated?

Mr. JONAS. I was about to state. I will state——

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to hear it.

Mr. JONAS. The Senator was present as a spectator. The present judges of the supreme court were installed in this way: they were appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate, as the constitution of the State provides; they were installed by the people of the city of New Orleans, rising en masse, going down and accompanying them to the door of the court-house where it was their duty to sit. The people of New Orleans in performing this delicate duty of installing the supreme court were obliged to cross as narrow a bridge as that upon which the true Mohammedan believer expects to enter paradise; the deviation of a single line, a single accident, a single disturbance, would have authorized the United States troops to appear upon the scene and ended all possibility of the accomplishment of that purpose.

Mr. MCMILLAN rose.

Mr. JONAS. Senators will pardon me. I cannot be interrupted now. I will state the facts exactly as they occurred. Those citizens were armed, and armed for the purpose of meeting the metropolitan police and the cohorts of the existing government. The military orders were that if a gun was fired, if there was a single fight, if there was any disturbance of the public peace, they must interfere and take military control. And knowing and appreciating the fact that if a gun was fired, that if there was any conflict, the Federal power would intervene and the Federal soldiers be put in possession, the people went down and installed their supreme court; and as they passed down to the court-house the soldiers of the United States Army were gathered in their quarters at the custom-house; the building was full of soldiers, who stood at the windows as the people passed; and below, in another chamber, sat the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] and his colleagues on his committee, among whom were my friends the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY;] and as the citizens passed on this errand of peace to install their legally elected government, the gallant boys in blue of the United States Army stood at the windows and cheered them until the echoes rang again. Does the Senator remember that?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I remember no echoes or cheers from the boys in blue.

Mr. JONAS. The Senator's memory is shorter than that of his colleagues.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I can state to the Senator that I do remember that there were judges of the supreme court whose titles were undisputed and indisputable, and that an armed mob of more than fifteen hundred men, with two pieces of artillery, in procession, marched past the soldiers of the United States, who withheld their force, to the supreme-court room and took possession of it and installed men as judges of the supreme court of Louisiana who had not a shadow of title to the office and who are now the judges of the supreme court; and the general commanding that department——

Mr. JONAS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield further.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Further——

Mr. JONAS. I decline to be interrupted any further for a speech.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am sorry the Senator does not like to hear the truth.

Mr. JONAS. If the Senator will give me some of his speeches I will frank them to my constituents, but I do not want his speeches to be interpolated in mine. The supreme judges who were installed were lawfully elected; they were installed in place of men whose terms of office had expired. They have been recognized——

Mr. KELLOGG. The supreme court lawfully elected, does my colleague say?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to his colleague?

Mr. JONAS. I decline to yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. They are appointed.

Mr. JONAS. Lawfully appointed.

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague said "lawfully elected."

Mr. JONAS. If so, I made a mistake in a word. That court since and now is recognized by the highest authorities in this land and by the Supreme Court of the United States as the lawful and legal supreme court of the State of Louisiana, as it is.

Mr. President, after the installation of the supreme court, and after the installation of Mr. Hayes, and after he had sent his visiting statesmen to spy out the land, and after he had become satisfied that there was nothing more to be wrung from the people of Louisiana, and after he had become satisfied that either he must recognize the government chosen by our people or subvert that government by the bayonet, which he could not afford to do, he withdrew the troops from the State of Louisiana. He has received great credit for doing this. The withdrawal of the troops by Mr. Hayes, if right, was a condemnation of the policy of his predecessor who kept them there in possession of the government of Louisiana for the preceding eight years. The withdrawal of the troops by the present President if right, is a condemnation of the doctrine of his message vetoing a measure by which Congress proposed to take away the power from the President which his predecessor misused and the use of which he himself condemned.

Now, Mr. President, we come to 1878, and there were no troops in the State, and there was scarcely any party contest in the State. There was no republican ticket in the field except in some few parishes. They had no State ticket; as a general thing they were supporting the ticket of the national party. They had no organization; there was scarcely a contest, and then a new form of political persecution was devised. Instead of bayonets, we were introduced to political courts. We have tried them both and we prefer the bayonets. After the election, for some cause, I do not know what, unless it was thought desirable to empty the seats of two or three members of Congress elected by the people of Louisiana in order to decrease the small democratic majority and secure the organization of the House of Representatives in the interest of the republican party, a political committee was sent by this honorable body to the State of Louisiana to examine into the conduct of the election in that State and the events which preceded the election. The Teller committee was the advance guard in the political persecutions designed to be leveled against the people of Louisiana through the instrumentality of the United States courts. I have been very much amused, Mr. President, by witnessing the admiration that the honorable chairman of that committee has for his work. For the first few weeks of the session it was constantly upon his lap and constantly under examination, and the speakers who spoke upon this question were furnished with the pabulum they desired from that valuable contribution to modern literature, the report of the Teller committee. For the last few days we have heard less of it; still it is used as a basis for all the charges that are made against the people of Louisiana and the people of South Carolina. Following the Teller committee, which cut out the path, the United States courts went to work.

Mr. KELLOGG. If my friend will allow——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. JONAS. For a question simply.

Mr. KELLOGG. For a question only. Before my friend passes from the topic he dealt with a moment ago regarding the Teller committee and the election of 1878, I should like to inquire of my friend if the result of that election is known yet in Louisiana?

Mr. JONAS. The election of 1878?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONAS. The result was announced within a week or ten days after it was over.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator then tell the Senate what has become of the constitutional amendments, ten or twenty of which were voted on?

Mr. JONAS. They were all defeated?

Mr. KELLOGG. Were they so returned?

Mr. JONAS. They were so returned.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has not the secretary of state declared that it was impossible to state the result?

Mr. JONAS. That it was impossible to state the result all the way through, simply because of the obscurity of the vote.

Mr. KELLOGG. Was not the election in such a jumble, resulting from the manipulation of the returning officers, that it was impossible to tell whether the amendments had been carried or not?

Mr. JONAS. Not at all, except as to certain amendments, which were a matter of very small importance.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, I ask my colleague if it is not a fact that it was twenty days before the result was known as to the election of some of the candidates who ran on the ticket, owing to the manipulation of the returning board?

Mr. JONAS. No, sir; I repudiate the charge and I deny that a returning board exists in the State of Louisiana. Mr. President, act No. 1 of the acts of 1877, when the Nicholls legislature organized, was an act which repealed the returning board forever. The people of Louisiana felt when they came into power that they would stay in power because they had a large majority on a fair vote of the people, and they felt that they needed no returning board even if they would have condescended to use any such machinery. The people of Louisiana felt like the genie in the Arabian Nights, whose first act, when released from the casket where he had existed for thousands of years, was to kick the vessel into the sea so that it could never again imprison him; and the first act of the people of Louisiana was to abolish the returning board. And I say as to the election in the State of Louisiana in 1878, the result, with the names of all persons elected, was known in the city of New Orleans within ten days after the election, and in the face of the fact that a portion of that State——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. JONAS. I do not yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask simply——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. JONAS. I do not yield. In face of the fact that a large portion of the State at that time was yet devastated by yellow fever; in face of the fact that we have few railroads and slow mail-routes, the news was received early and the votes were counted by officers at home, at the polls where they were cast, and returned to the secretary of state without the intervention of any returning board and without the intervention of any new-fangled and newly discovered election machinery.

Mr. President, after the Teller committee had left New Orleans and returned to their homes, their work became evident in the fact that the grand jury of the Federal court (a grand jury from whom all were excluded who could not take the test oath, and which was composed almost exclusively of republicans) proceeded to find indictments against a large number of the best citizens of three or four parishes in the State. They indicted in the parish of Natchitoches some forty-five citizens and they were all brought from their homes to stand their trial in the city of New Orleans. They were indicted for a conspiracy to prevent voters from casting their votes for J. Madison Wells for Congress in the fourth congressional district of Louisiana. J. Madison Wells is well known throughout the length and breadth of the land as the president of the celebrated returning board. He is the man who counted the votes in 1874, he is the man who counted the votes in 1876, he is the man who made the President who sits in the White House to-day, and he holds a Federal office in the city of New Orleans. This conspiracy was for preventing citizens from voting for J. Madison Wells, and the acts complained of were alleged to have occurred in September when the election took place in November. As I say, forty-five citizens were brought to New Orleans for trial, necessitating their absence from home for weeks, necessitating their being held to heavy bail, necessitating their bringing down hundreds of witnesses to defend their characters and prove the falsity of the charge. What was the class of the parties accused? They were the best citizens of that parish. They included the district judge, the parish judge, the district attorney, the sheriff; they included every parish officer, the leading tax-payers, the oldest citizens, every member of the bar, an ex-member of the Forty-fourth Congress, and almost every man of respectability in the parish, so that not to be indicted was almost a mark of dishonor and disgrace in that parish. Will it be considered as probable that all the citizens and all the men of character in a parish would be so unmindful of their obligations and duties as to engage in a conspiracy to break the laws? It frequently happens that one, two, or three men who have been law-abiding during the course of a long life depart from the path of rectitude and justice, but that all of the best citizens of a parish should have thus disregarded the laws which many of them were sworn to obey (as public officers) is incredible; indeed, it would have seemed ridiculous had not the comedy been so nearly merged in tragedy.

They were indicted and they were prosecuted by a confederate district attorney, now in high favor with the powers that be, and the text-book of the trial was the report of the Teller committee, an advance copy of which was in his possession, and the witnesses were allowed to refresh their memories from that text-book; the witnesses for the prosecution were the same witnesses who had appeared before the Teller committee. A jury was empaneled, and every man was excluded from that jury who could not take the test oath, the judge presiding sustaining the constitutionality of the test oath. It was said the other day in this Chamber that the administration of the test oath in the South now is a matter of but little consequence, as the most of the population have grown up since the war and a majority of the people are able to take the test oath, not having been engaged in the war.

I say, Mr. President, that two-thirds of that panel of jurymen who were called up to be sworn were rejected because they testified on oath that they had either been in the confederate army or had aided, or abetted, or sympathized with the confederate cause. There was one man brought up to be empaneled on that jury who testified that he was but "twenty-seven years old." He was asked if he had served in the confederate army or aided, abetted, or sympathized with the confederate cause. He answered that he was but nine years old when the war began. "Did you," said the district attorney, "aid, abet, or sympathize with the confederate cause?" And he answered, "Well, I believe I gave my pocket-money out of my money-box to the confederate soldiers." "How much money was in it?" "About a dollar and a half." "Well," said the district attorney, "may it please your honor, I challenge the juror for cause." We mildly submitted to his honor that this young man could hardly be held responsible for the heinous crime committed in his youth in giving his money to the confederate cause, and pleaded infancy. The judge gravely told the district attorney, "This seems to be carrying the thing most too far; I overrule the objection."

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish merely to understand the Senator.

Mr. JONAS. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. His statement confuses me.

Mr. JONAS. I will try to make it plain.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator to say that a challenge for cause was interposed?

Mr. JONAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the Senator will observe that the section of the statute of which complaint is made now, section 821, had nothing to do with the case, because under that section the only proceeding would have been to require of this juror, then an infant, the oath prescribed in the statute; and when a challenge for cause was interposed it was a proceeding radically different from that indicated or tolerated by this statute. My confusion grew out of that. I cannot comprehend how a challenge for cause had anything to do with this section 821.

Mr. JONAS. The judge decided that a man could not sit on that jury unless he could take the test oath, and he ruled that the district attorney was entitled to ask jurors whether they had aided or abetted or sympathized with the confederate cause during the late war, and if they answered "yes" that was sufficient cause for challenge. This young man answered that he had when he was nine years old, and we objected that he was an infant, and the judge said——

Mr. CONKLING. Now will the Senator pardon me there? Surely the Senator does not suppose that that proceeding took place under the section——

Mr. JONAS. I do not suppose it. I saw it. I was one of the counsel.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will listen to the suggestion, he will understand the suggestion as well as if he interposes now. I say that in aid of the Senator's statement, because I submit to him that it cannot be that this proceeding took place under section 821 of the statutes. I say to him that this seems to have been a case of a challenge of a juror in a case in which the test oath of which he is talking was administered. Had it been, no question need to have been put to the juror, no challenge interposed but simply the court moved to require him to take it.

Mr. JONAS. I cannot yield further. I am not talking about what ought to be done or could be done. I am saying that the judge of that court ruled that no man could sit on the jury unless he could take the test oath, and he ruled that the district attorney had a right to ask every juror, as he was called up, whether he had aided, abetted, or sympathized with the confederate cause, and that if he did aid, abet, or sympathize with the confederate cause it was good ground for challenge, and generally the judge performed the duty himself by telling the juror to stand aside——

Mr. KELLOGG rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. JONAS. I do not. I decline to yield. This juror was admitted by the judge, who said it was drawing the thing too fine, and he thought he could take the oath, then the district attorney challenged him peremptorily, and we selected a jury as well as we could out of men none of whom were of the vicinage of the accused. The accused were brought from Natchitoches Parish, three hundred miles from the city of New Orleans, but the jurymen were all drawn from that city. This jury was selected from a few men who could take the test oath because they had served in the Federal Army, or from men who were old and had taken no part in the late war, or from young men who had grown up to maturity since the war, and had not in their infancy given their pocket-money to the confederate cause. We succeeded in getting such a jury.

Now, as to this test oath. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New York seems to think its repeal is a matter more sentimental than practical, as applicable in the Southern States. Why, sir, let me tell you what was said to me by the district judge of that court, Judge Billings, just before my departure for Washington. He did not try this case. It was tried by Judge Woods of the circuit court. He told me that he had gone to the Attorney-General, and that he had seen the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee at that time of this body, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and had told both of them that unless the test oath was repealed it was impossible for him to conduct his court and do justice toward litigants or justice toward criminals. He told them that the test oath excluded from duty in the jury-box nearly all of the best citizens, and nearly all the intelligent property-holders, and most of the tax-paying people of the city of New Orleans, and forced him to draw his juries from ignorance and barbarism or from people who had little or no stake or interest in the community.

In this instance three out of five men who were called to serve on that jury were unable to serve because they could not take the test oath; and the result was that this case, political in its character, had to be tried before a jury packed. I use the expression "packed" because it was impaneled in disregard of law, in violation of the Constitution, and in violation of the rights of the accused. The case was tried before that jury, and it was prosecuted not only ably, but vindictively. It occupied two weeks. All the witnesses who were heard before the Teller committee were heard again, and numerous witnesses who were not heard before that committee, and the evidence was plain that there was nothing political in the affair at all; that it had occurred two months before the election; that the difficulty, in which not one drop of blood was spilled nor a man injured, occurred in September, and was simply an organization of the citizens of that parish to protect their homes from incendiarism and their women from violence. Why, Mr. President, in old times, in the settlement of New England, and in the settlement of the West at a more recent date, when the citizens went to church or assembled at the hustings or the court-house, they carried their arms with them and prepared themselves for battle in case the whoop of the savage should be heard and in case their women and children should be threatened and molested; and the people of Natchitoches, the white population much smaller than the colored population, knowing that incendiaries were in their midst, knowing that men were urging an organization of the colored people for the purpose of burning the town of Natchitoches and murdering its citizens and violating its women, organized themselves for the purpose of self-protection, and all they did was to send, under proper safeguard, three or four of the ringleaders threatening disturbance and inciting the colored people to violence, out of the city of Natchitoches. This was "the head and front of their offending." I fear those parties would have fared much worse in Nebraska, in Kansas, in Iowa, or in any of our Western States, where the rule of Judge Lynch is much more prevalent and much more terrible than it ever has been in Louisiana.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONAS. For a question simply.

Mr. TELLER. That is all. I understand the honorable Senator to say that the jury was packed. I desire to ask him if he knows the political complexion of the jury; and if so, to state it.

Mr. JONAS. A large majority of them were republicans; some, though, were democrats.

Mr. TELLER. I am informed that ten of them were democrats.

Mr. JONAS. The gentleman is mistaken. The majority of them were republicans, and several of them had served in the Federal Army during the late war. These facts were apparent; these facts were proven; and these people were all acquitted, the jury only being in deliberation a very short time.

The witnesses upon whose evidence these accusations were made were witnesses who, like most of the witnesses that have been brought before committees of investigation in the South, were people who would not be believed on oath by their own neighbors at home. It was shown that the leading witnesses for the prosecution belonged to a ring who for years had ruled the parish of Natchitoches to its destruction. It was shown that they had stolen the funds of the parish; that they had stolen the taxes of the people; that they had stolen the school funds from the colored schools; that they had increased the taxes upon the people of that single parish until their tax was seventy-nine and a half mills per annum, 8 per cent. per annum of tax the people of Natchitoches were paying, inflicted upon them mainly by the leading prosecuting witnesses in this case.

The next cases were the Caddo cases. The honorable Senator from Colorado has much to say in his report about the outrages in Caddo. There were some disturbances there. Some people were killed. The republicans of the committee charged the democrats with it. The democrats charged the republicans with it. At any rate the matter was thoroughly investigated by this packed grand jury, and the grand jury failed to find an indictment against any citizen of Caddo for any of these affairs in which there were fights and blood-shed. But they did find indictments against some seventy-five citizens of the parish of Caddo. Those citizens were the election commissioners. It was a labor of love with the district attorney, because the district attorney came from the parish of Caddo, and being at war politically with his people, and having lost his parish at the general election, he wished to revenge himself upon them. These people were brought down charged with what? With having had three boxes for election purposes in the parish of Caddo on election day, when according to the construction of the law made by the United States district attorney they were only entitled to have two boxes. And this was said to be a conspiracy to defraud J. Madison Wells of votes. It was shown that every vote cast for Congress was carefully counted. It was shown that every vote cast for J. Madison Wells was put in the box for him and counted for him; and it was shown that a question arose as to whether the votes for the parish ticket and the congressional ticket should be put upon the same pieces of paper and in the same box; and the commissioners sought the best legal advice to be obtained in the parish of Caddo, where there is the best bar outside of the city of New Orleans in the whole State, and a large majority of the lawyers advised them to have three boxes, and they had three boxes.

These cases were tried, tried before a jury also required to take the test oath, and a jury composed of eight colored men and four white men; and to the best of my belief not a single democrat was upon the jury. When these cases were tried the charge was so absolutely ridiculous that the judge instructed the jury that they must discharge two of the prisoners, as there was no case against them; and as to the others, he charged them that if they believed that these commissioners in good faith asked for legal advice and followed it they were bound also to acquit them; and yet this wise jury, selected from the body of the people, composed of eight colored men and four white men, in a city where four-fifths of the population are white and a large majority of the population is democratic, were unable to agree even to discharge the prisoners whom the judge had told them they were bound to discharge, and the cases went over until next fall.

Then, Mr. President, there is the parish of Tensas. In the Tensas case, also, some one hundred prisoners were indicted, and two or three hundred witnesses were brought from the parish of Tensas to attend the trial; and the prosecution of this case was pressed by the Government, and it came on for trial since the meeting of this extra session. The defendants sought for delay; they were unable to produce their witnesses in court, and the court accorded them but a brief delay to procure such testimony as was absolutely necessary. The district attorney and the court refused to grant the delay the defendants asked, prosecuted the case with bitterness, if not with malevolence; yet when the case came on for trial on the 10th of last month the district attorney, probably actuated by some dispatch received from the city of Washington, rose and moved to adjourn and continue the case until next fall. The Government abandoned the prosecution for the time being. They were unwilling to meet the case.

I say here to-day, whatever may be in the report of the Teller committee, that I appeal from the Teller committee, when that case shall be called, to a test-oath jury, no test-oath jury in the city of New Orleans or in the country will convict the people of Tensas. Their trouble was not political, and the people prosecuted are innocent of any offense against the election laws whatsoever, if guilty of any offense at all, which I deny.

My colleague the other day alluded to the parish of Tensas, and made a point of the fact that the parish of Tensas which sent democratic members to the last Legislature had sent two republicans to the constitutional convention just assembled. Why, Mr. President, the parish of Tensas has a very small white population, and a very large colored population. It is not pretended that the white people control the colored vote in the State of Louisiana or elsewhere except by their moral influence over them, and the parish of Tensas voted fairly for the democratic ticket at the preceding election, but at this election for the constitutional convention, there were one hundred and sixty of the leading men of Tensas, every leading man in that parish, down in the parish of Orleans where they had been dragged to await the trial in the Federal court either as accused or witnesses, and it was impossible to carry the parish for the democratic party, and it was not likely that the colored people who, seeing that voting the democratic ticket only led to prosecution and persecution in the Federal court, would be induced to pursue further the experiment which they tried the year before.

Mr. President, there was much said by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] of kuklux, white leagues, and night-riders. All of them, so far as Louisiana is concerned, are hobgoblins of his own imagination. There are no kuklux, there are no white leagues, there are no night-riders in the State of Louisiana. There are no secret political organizations there. There is no attempt to control either the white or the colored vote in that State except in the modes and manners which are used by civilized people everywhere in the prosecution of political canvasses. There was a white league in Louisiana in 1874. It was born in that year and it died in that year, but it was no such organization as the Senator would have you infer. It was no secret organization, it was no oath-bound organization; it was open to the day. It was organized for the purpose of insuring a fair election and a fair count in the State of Louisiana; for the purpose of protecting the people of that State from the rule of barbarism and corruption. It never resorted to violence, it never resorted to secrecy, it never rode at night, it never interfered with voters. It was organized for the express purpose of protecting the purity of the ballot-box and not of aiding to destroy it.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about the exodus from the South before I close. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] in his speech made a few weeks ago lamented the future decadence of the South, owing to the fact that they were about to lose this population so valuable to them. Every Senator almost who has spoken since on that side has referred to this exodus from the South as of a people fleeing from persecution, from violence, from death, in the pursuit of liberty and happiness. The only two parishes in the State of Louisiana from which there has been any exodus are the parishes of Madison and Carroll. I saw the statements which were published in the Saint Louis papers, which have been copied here, giving the evidence of some of those people who had fled from their homes, and an account of the persecutions to which they had been subjected in times past; that they were deprived of their political privileges, and were seeking a new country, where they could have equality and the right to vote freely and undisturbed. Mr. President, I will give the vote cast in those two parishes at the last election. In the parish of Madison there were 332 democratic and 2,528 republican votes; in the parish of Carroll, 592 democratic and 2,410 republican votes. Ever since reconstruction those two parishes have been under the full control and the full sway of the republican party by majorities of about 2,000 apiece. No democrat has ever been elected to office there. Not a man has ever been killed, there has never been a fight, there has never been a disturbance there on account of political differences. Those parishes are ruled and controlled by the people who have been fleeing from them.

One of those who had the most piteous tale to tell was a man named Curtis Pollard. Curtis Pollard was a representative from the parish of Madison. He was a senator from that district. He was elected again and again until his own people became tired of him and elected a more honest, a more reputable, a more intelligent man of his own class, his own color, and his own party to succeed him, and that man, Senator Gla, is outspoken in his condemnation of the exodus. These men, who had complete political power, were not seduced away and did not leave their homes because of political causes. They were led away by seductive pictures of paradise (because a colored man's idea of paradise is that of a country where he can live without labor) which were spread out before him in an attractive, seductive manner. Beautiful chromos and lithographs were distributed in their cabins in which life in Kansas was represented by a picture of a home with three or four apartments, where the negro was sitting in front of his door, his day's work done, a beautiful crop growing around him, with fat cattle and hogs turned loose in his yard; his wife, dressed in white, sitting on the gallery, and his children, well dressed, coming home from school. The sugar-cane and every tropical plant flourished spontaneously in that climate; and immediately back of his door the buffalo, the elk, and the deer gamboled, so that it was only necessary for him to step to the back window in order to kill his game.

All those pictures were circulated through my State. The colored people were induced to go to Kansas because they were told they could make a fortune, and they were not making a fortune at home. Who was making a fortune at home? Have the last few years been years of such unexampled prosperity that there is not complaint from the laboring-men of the North and the West? The planters who employ this labor were feeling the effects of the hard times. There is scarcely a cotton planter in the South who has made any money for the last two or three years, and they have been fortunate if they made a living; most of them are embarrassed by debt; and yet these colored men all made at least a living; they were all able to provide homes for themselves and families. None of them felt the pangs of hunger, none of them were without homes, while a great many white men in the North are devoid of the comforts of house and home. We have in the South none of the homeless tramps, none of those men who are wandering in want from State to State and from county to county, having no living and begging for work. There was employment for every one; and after the colored people who sought new homes in Kansas and found the fallacy of their dreams, the men whom they have abandoned have written them to return back, and, realizing how baseless was the inducement which led them away, in many instances they have returned to their home, and the return is now equal to the exodus.

The leading colored men in Louisiana have all opposed this exodus and condemn it. My colleague knows Mr. Allain, who has been a member of the Legislature ever since reconstruction and is now a senator and a member of the constitutional convention.

Mr. KELLOGG. He was a member of the returning board, was he not?

Mr. JONAS. I did not know that. I thought much better of him.

Mr. KELLOGG. Allain was a member of the Nicholls returning board, appointed just after the inauguration of Nicholls in January, 1877.

Mr. JONAS. This is what he said:

T. T. Allain desired to have the question discussed dispassionately, and not with an idea to secure political capital. He declared the time had passed in Louisiana when the colored people could be led step by step as they had been in the past. In his district the white and colored people were working harmoniously together. As a proof of this he cited the fact that at the last election there was only one ticket in the field, which was supported by both the whites and blacks, and was called the people's ticket. • He denounced the few self-constituted leaders of the colored race who have been endeavoring to persuade the negroes to emigrate. He wished his race to tell these self-constituted leaders to return to their homes in Ohio, where they belong, and leave the colored people in this State to live in peace. [Applause.] He wanted his people to remain in this State, and if they could not stay in the cotton-growing section, let them remove to the sugar belt, and better times would soon come.

To the same effect spoke Mr. Pinchback. To the same effect spoke Mr. David Young, who, as my colleague knows, is a leading man among the colored race in the State of Louisiana. But the most impressive speech I have read was delivered in a convention of colored people by a gentleman well known to Senators upon this floor, a young man named James D. Kennedy, who for several years past has been, I am told, a messenger in this Hall, and he is known to every Senator on the other side. Mr. Kennedy opposed the exodus very bitterly:

In speaking of capitalists, he wanted to know if those present were aware of the fact that in Georgia, the first State to pass from republican to democratic rule, the colored men owned twenty-five million dollars' worth of property, and should they be called upon to go and leave all that they had acquired? He was not opposed to any man leaving the State and going to any other State he might select, but he did object to this body undertaking to speak for the mass of the colored people of the State. If the merchant, if the capitalist, if the men who own the cotton-gins and the cotton-presses would only say to the colored man, you stay and we will protect you with our lives, why where would be the necessity of leaving the South? This talk of the Windom resolutions and of the donation of a tract of land for a Territory was all moonshine. The politicians were using the people and appealing to their passions for their own uses. They had already deserted the people who had sacrificed so much for them. He could tell things that he had seen and heard while in Washington which would make their ears tingle. He had heard leading republican statesmen say in the cloak-room, about the persecution of the negro, "Well, it's what you have got to look for; you can't expect that mass of ignorance to rule the intelligence." And these same men have gone out and on the floor of the Senate or House they have talked long and eloquently about the wrongs of the poor colored man. They were then talking to the country and for a purpose.

I trust the gentlemen on the other side will be more careful hereafter in keeping the secrets of their cloak-room.

Mr. President, the desire of Louisiana is for peace. The anxiety of her people is for immigration. Send us a million of white people, we care not from where they come. We will take them all from New England; they all may be republicans, and we will welcome them with open arms. Not only will their emigration give some chance to the honest democracy of the States from which they come to redeem their States, but the benign and softening influence of our climate, soil, and institutions will soften the asperities born of contact with Plymouth Rock and the granite hills of New England and render them moderate, conservative, and tolerant in their political views. But little care we what may be the political views of emigrants coming to Louisiana provided they bring that energy, that intelligence, and that labor and that capital which is needed to develop the magnificent natural resources of our State and cause her, in the fulfillment of her destiny, to become the garden-spot of the world.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am admonished, Mr. President, that four o'clock has arrived, or very nearly so, and I rise for the purpose of an inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The Chair will announce to the Senator from Louisiana that by the agreement made yesterday debate closes at four o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator who wants the few remaining moments, the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. Who is recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. CONKLING. Then I submit he may be allowed to proceed as he has only a moment.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I was absent from the Chamber when the arrangement was made for the time to take the vote, I was about to inquire for information if it is understood that the vote is to be taken at four o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The colleague of the Senator has occupied nearly to that time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I suppose it is impossible for me, as I have but one or two minutes at most, to answer any of the remarks made by my colleague. If I could have five minutes by any ruling of the Senate, on an amendment or anything of that kind or by any motion made by me, I should like to occupy the attention of the Senate for that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that had the Senator from Louisiana continued with his remarks the Chair would have called him to order at four o'clock and announced to him that there was an understanding that the vote was to be taken at four o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must beg to ask the Chair not to call anybody to order for speaking after four o'clock, for there never has been an order of the Senate of that kind in the history of it, and never will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would have taken the responsibility of suggesting that the hour had arrived.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, that is another thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was agreed yesterday to take the vote to-day at four o'clock. That was an agreement that cannot be enforced by the Chair, as has been repeatedly decided. Every Senator must act upon his own consciousness of what is proper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That states the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I believe I have one minute. In that one minute I will simply say that had I time as I would wish, I think I could show that a great many of the statements made by my colleague are incorrect. I could show, I think, that so far as the elections of 1868 and 1872 and 1874 and 1876 and 1878 are concerned, there are few material allegations made by my colleague founded in fact or that can be corroborated by history.

If I had time I should like to refer to the election of 1868, and show that half the State was overrun by violence at that election.

In the city of New Orleans, with over 30,000 votes on the then existing registration, nearly 15,000 of them colored, in the spring of that year at a peaceable election nearly 14,000 votes were polled for the republican candidates for State offices, while in the presidential election in the fall of the same year, after weeks of riot, General Grant received barely 1,100 votes in the whole city of New Orleans; and I myself saw but a few days before the election, so great was the terror and so rampant was the violence, colored men shot down and dragged along the pavements, leaving the marks of their blood, thrown into carts, and carted off to the cemeteries. If my colleague desires the details I will give them to him "line upon line and precept upon precept," and in such manner that neither he nor any other man can controvert successfully. My colleague says there was a fair and peaceable election in 1868. Fair and peaceable when the people were by violence deprived of their rights and throughout the whole State the republican vote was nearly entirely suppressed!

Mr. CONKLING. The time is out.

Mr. CALL. I hope that the vote on this bill will not be pressed at this time. I should like very much to address the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. If the Senator will yield a moment, I wish to make a suggestion or a motion, so that no Senator may be deprived of the privilege or the right of addressing himself to the Senate if he desires to do so upon this question. I will move, if it is in order, that the time be fixed instead of four o'clock, which we have now passed, at half past six to take the vote.

Mr. CONKLING. No such motion is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No motion of that kind is in order because it is against the rules. As I am up, while I do not interfere with this arrangement, which was made while I was out for three minutes yesterday, I wish to give notice that I shall not regard myself hereafter as bound by any arrangement of this character to which I am not personally a party, and I do not think any Senator ought to be, because it is a mere understanding among those who are present. If they do not want to speak, very well, but Senators who happen for a moment to be necessarily absent ought not to be concluded by such an understanding, and hereafter I shall not feel myself bound to be so.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, of course, that breaks up the possibility of ever having an understanding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, break it up.

Mr. GARLAND. There might be a very considerable question raised upon that point, if I were disposed to do so, as to whether it is the duty of a Senator to be here; but I am trying to get out of this difficulty for the accommodation of all the Senators. There was an understanding that the vote should be taken at four o'clock. It is immaterial to me whether it is taken between now and the Fourth of July, so far as I am individually concerned; but I want every Senator who desires to speak to have an opportunity to do so. Although it was the understanding that we should vote at four o'clock, can we not now agree upon some hour two or three hours ahead, so that when a Senator speaks he will not speak under restraint but will have full opportunity to address the Senate; and if that is insufficient the time can be extended an hour longer. I made the suggestion in good faith for the accomodation of Senators.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I did not understand the Senator otherwise.

Mr. BECK. One word, if I may be allowed. Yesterday morning, after the debate had run for some two weeks, from the 6th of May when I believe we reported the bill back, I rose and asked the Senate to agree upon some time when the vote should be taken without further debate, and I suggested four o'clock to-day as the time. The Senate was pretty full and the President pro tempore may remember that he took very considerable time before he put the question, I think perhaps repeating it twice and waiting to see if any objection was made. None was made; the agreement seemed to be satisfactory to everybody. It was not made with a view of cutting off any debate, but, on the contrary, of giving the fullest latitude to debate, and if any suggestion had been made of a later hour I of course would have assented to it.

I have said to-day, and I repeat now, that if the Senate will agree to any hour, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, or twelve o'clock to-night, let the agreement be extended to suit the views of everybody. If the time is not going to be extended, then I hope after two weeks of debate that we shall have a vote. I hope that gentlemen who have agreed to take the vote to-day will vote before they adjourn, after the agreement they made, which was not coerced but voluntarily entered into.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not agree to any extension that fixes an hour, but I will vote with the Senator from Kentucky not to adjourn until the debate is closed, because I think it ought to be. However, I think every gentleman ought to have a chance to speak his mind, no matter how long it takes; but as for fixing any hour on this or on any other occasion that I can now think of, I shall never agree to do it.

Mr. CALL. When the agreement was entered into yesterday morning, there were a number of Senators who had indicated a purpose to speak upon this bill. It was understood, I understood myself from the Senator from Kentucky who has charge of the bill, that there was enough time for all the gentlemen who wished to express their opinions upon the subject to the Senate to be heard. There have been one or two additional speeches to-day, to which I am sure no one should object, but which have occupied the time of the Senate. I do not see that there is any reason why a conclusion should be reached so harshly when Senators desire to be heard upon the bill. When the understanding was taken, it was taken unexpectedly. I myself was not aware of what was being done until it was done. I think it is only a proper thing to ask that we shall have the opportunity of being heard both on this and the other side of the Chamber. I am perfectly willing if it is the pleasure of the Senate that we should remain here to-night, or to extend the time, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair has stated, there is no mode of enforcing this agreement. It rests entirely with every Senator to decide for himself whether he will observe it, even if he were a party to it. That has been the uniform decision of the Senate. Nor is there any mode of fixing an hour by the order of the Senate, at which a vote shall be taken, for that would be to introduce the previous question into the Senate in effect, or at least to a great extent, a thing that has never been done in the Senate. If any Senator therefore takes the floor, the Chair will be compelled to allow him to speak.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the agreement made yesterday may be considered as rescinded. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] states that although he was present at the time, he did not understand the full import of the agreement. He desires to address the Senate. I think the safest way out of this difficulty is to rescind unanimously the agreement made yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. If this debate is to be continued, I suppose it will be admitted at once that the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] is entitled to the floor. He was taken off the floor by the arrival of the hour at which the vote was to be taken. I trust, if there is to be any extension of time, that the honorable Senator from Louisiana will be heard in answer to his colleague. But if the vote is not taken now I trust that no hour will again be fixed for taking it. I have never during the eighteen or nineteen years that I have been in this body known an extension of a time for taking a vote which had been once fixed by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I propose, if I have the right, to address the Senate upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to ask a question of the Chair.

Mr. CALL. I do not know how far I may be trespassing. If I am trespassing upon the custom of the Senate, I shall not insist upon going on. I would ask, however, unanimous consent of the Senate that I may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, when the hour had arrived at which the Senate, by unanimous consent, had agreed to vote, (because for one I wish to disclaim and discard all distinction if one is thought to exist between the obligation of a Senator who was here and another Senator like myself who was not here, as I should have been, when the understanding was given) the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] occupied the floor. I ventured to remind him that the time had come, he sitting at a point from which the clock is not very squarely visible, because I knew, or at least I thought I knew, he would not like to overstep the boundary. Yielding to that suggestion, he surrendered the floor. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if it should be held, in consequence of any Senator refusing to regard the understanding or otherwise, that the understanding is not to be enforced, the Senator from Louisiana having been interrupted by my observation is not entitled to the floor. In other words, I wish to inquire whether it can be that a Senator yielding to the understanding loses the floor because some other Senator chooses to say, "I refuse to observe the understanding?" It seems to me that would be rather a harsh application of the willingness of a Senator to observe an obligation.

Mr. CALL. I will withdraw my request for unanimous consent and let the agreement stand, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I think the Senate will bear testimony to the fact that no Senator is more impatient of a long discussion than myself, but in this debate there have been no speeches against time. There is an honest desire on the part of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to be heard upon the question. The arrangement was made yesterday in the absence of several Senators, two certainly, I think three, who desire to address the Senate. I appeal, therefore, to my friend from Kentucky if it is not better to abandon the arrangement which we made and to let this discussion run until it expires by its natural limitation. I will pledge myself to stand by him in voting against an adjournment to-night until a vote is reached.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not stand by such an agreement.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is better that we should allow every Senator to speak who desires to be heard, for the disposition of the Senate is not to keep off the vote.

Mr. BECK. I have said time and again that if the Senate agreed to take the final vote to-night before we adjourn, I do not care what hour we fix or whether any hour is fixed. If the Senate will now agree that the vote shall be taken before adjournment to-night I have no objection to the debate going on; and I desire it to be arranged that way so as to give each gentleman who wishes to address the Senate an opportunity to be heard. Whether we adjourn at eight o'clock or twelve o'clock to-night or four o'clock in the morning, makes no difference to me so that the vote is taken before the Senate adjourns to-night.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to object to any gentleman proceeding who wishes to address the Senate or to object to a rescission of the arrangement; but when five o'clock comes, if I get an opportunity, I shall move to adjourn, if nobody else does, and I shall vote for the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In answer to the question addressed to the Chair by the Senator from New York the Chair will state that while the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] was on his feet, and before he had concluded his remarks, the Chair announced that this agreement was one that was not binding in such sense that it could be enforced by the Chair. The Senator from Louisiana was therefore at liberty to proceed with his remarks if he saw fit to do so. He, however, saw fit to remain bound by the agreement, and took his seat. After that the Chair can only recognize the Senator who rises first. If the Senator from Louisiana should rise the Chair would certainly recognize him. The Senator who rises first must be recognized.

Mr. CONKLING, Mr. BLAINE, and others called for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. BAILEY. Let the question be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to strike out of the bill the portion that will now be read, from line 2108 to line 2168, inclusive.

Provided, That the per diem pay of each juror, grand or petit, in any court of the United States, shall be $2, and that the last clause of section 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which refers to the State of Pennsylvania, and sections 801, 820, and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are hereby repealed; and that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less than three hundred persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State; and no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, and all juries to serve in courts after the passage of this act shall be drawn in conformity herewith. All general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed: And provided further, That the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, namely, sections 2016, 2018, and 2020, and all of the succeeding sections of said statutes down to and including section 2027, and also section 5522, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 2017 be amended by striking out of the first line thereof as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "and required;" and that section 2019 be amended by striking out of said section in lines 11 and 12 as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots," and by striking out from line 13 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "in respect to such canvass."

That section 2028 be amended by striking out in lines 1 and 2 of said section as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "or a deputy marshal," and by striking out in line 3 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "city, town, county, parish." That all of section 2031 of said statutes, except so much thereof as relates to the pay of supervisors of elections, and that all other sections of the Revised Statutes and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of chief supervisors of elections, special deputy marshals of elections, or general deputy marshals having any duties to perform in respect to any election and prescribing their duties and powers and allowing them compensation, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

Mr. McDONALD. I have just announced my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES. Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McDONALD. I announced a pair between myself and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER;] but it passed out of my mind that by an arrangement made afterward the Senator from Wisconsin became paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST;] and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS. My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is absent from the city. Before he left he announced to me that he was paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] who I see is also absent. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill by striking out all in line 2113 after the word "twenty," to and including the word "herewith," in line 2136 where it last occurs, at the end of the line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words of the bill proposed to be stricken out will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby repealed; and that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less thar three hundred persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State; and no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, and all juries to serve in courts after the passage of this act shall be drawn in conformity herewith. All general and special laws in conflict herewith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I make the same announcement as before of the pair between myself and the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] I should vote "yea," were I not paired with him.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If the Senator from Ohio were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. As I have already announced heretofore, my colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] Were my colleague here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Missouri who states that his colleague is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, if the other day it was not announced that the Senator from Wisconsin was paired with my colleague, [Mr. DAVIS?] Has the pair been changed by the consent of my colleague?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] can explain the pair. My understanding is that my colleague was paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as was his usual way of asking a pair. That was the pair he announced to me, but the Senator from Indiana can explain how the pair was changed.

Mr. LOGAN. I noticed that the other day it was announced my colleague was paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] I know nothing about it, but I merely make the inquiry.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Wisconsin had occasion to be absent from the city for a week or ten days, and requested me to pair with him during his absence, authorizing me to change the pair off to another Senator if it was convenient to do so. In order to accommodate the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who had agreed to pair with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] the pairs were exchanged so as to pair the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.] That is the whole explanation.

Mr. LOGAN. I made the inquiry because it was announced that my colleague was paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, and I desired to know whether the pair was changed by the consent of my colleague.

Mr. McDONALD. The colleague of the Senator from Illinois was paired upon a particular vote with the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desired to know the fact, and my colleague not being here I thought I would inquire.

Mr. INGALLS. My colleague, [Mr. PLUMB,] I will repeat, is paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move an amendment that, if I were at liberty to speak, I should hope would meet with everybody's approval. I move to strike out in line 2137, all after the word "repealed" in that line to and including the word "repealed" in line 2168.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to strike out from the bill the passage that will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, namely, sections 2016, 2018, and 2020, and all of the succeeding sections of said statutes down to and including section 2027, and also section 5522, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 2017 be amended by striking out of the first line thereof as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "and required;" and that section 2019 be amended by striking out of said section in lines 11 and 12, as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots," and by striking out from line 13 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "in respect to such canvass."

That section 2023 be amended by striking out in lines 1 and 2 of said section as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "or a deputy marshal," and by striking out in line 3 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "city, town, county, parish." That all of section 2031 of said statutes, except so much thereof as relates to the pay of supervisors of elections, and that all other sections of the Revised Statutes and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of chief supervisors of elections, special deputy marshals of elections, or general deputy marshals having any duties to perform in respect to any election and prescribing their duties and powers and allowing them compensation, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe I shall not be out of order when I inquire whether the motion is to strike out all the provisions in the bill touching the election laws.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Platt,

ABSENT—12.

Butler,	Dawes,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,
Carpenter,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	Hamlin,	Pendleton,	Vest.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill by striking out in line 2142 all after the word "twenty-seven" to and including the word "twenty-two" in line 2143, that is to say these words:

And also section 5522.

The bill provides for repealing section 5522 of the Revised Statutes. I move to strike out the clause that repeals that section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if I do not violate anybody's understanding that I was not present to understand, I should like to have section 5522 read for the information of the Senate. Does anybody understand that that violates the understanding?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes that that would be in the nature of argument, but the Senator can have it read if he desires.

Mr. WITHERS. Every Senator can judge for himself as to what is a violation of the agreement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the Chair to say that to have it read would be debate, and therefore I shall not ask that the section be read.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to hear the section read for information, that I may understand the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the section? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or perverts the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room, where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the cost of the prosecution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Bell,	Chandler,	Kellogg,	Rollins,

NAYS—37.

Bailey,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Bayard,	Grover,	McDonald,	Voorhees,

ABSENT—12.

Butler,	Dawes,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,
Carpenter,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	Hamlin,	Pendleton,	Vest.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment. If there are no further amendments the question is, Shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANDLER and others. Let us take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second to the call?

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the call.

Mr. CONKLING. On the passage of the bill I demand the yeas and nays.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the bill pass? on which question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to move to amend the title of the bill now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to move to strike out all except the words "other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) Upon this vote I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] I should otherwise vote "nay."

Mr. BOOTH, (when Mr. FARLEY'S name was called.) My colleague, [Mr. FARLEY,] who is absent, is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I presume, if present, my colleague would vote for the bill, and the Senator from Nevada would vote against it.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Bailey,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Bayard,	Grover,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Beck,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Walker,

ABSENT—12.

Butler,	Dawes,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,
Carpenter,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	Hamlin,	Pendleton,	Vest.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BLAINE. I ought to have announced, to go on the record with the last vote, that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the steamer Erie, No. 5, and cargo, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday at twelve o'clock. I do this, Mr. President, because we have been in consecutive session for three weeks, without any opportunity whatever to have a single day to attend to departmental duties. I think a day ought to be given for that purpose, and therefore I make the motion.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 40, noes 16.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States. I will state that I simply desire to call the bill up that it may be the unfinished business, and we may proceed with its consideration on Thursday.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

WASHINGTON CITY POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope the Senator will yield for a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator from Michigan to withdraw the motion in order that I may enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. FERRY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yesterday the joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) authorizing the appointment of a commission to lease a building for a city post-office in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, was postponed until December next. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY. I withdraw my motion. The Senator from Rhode Island desires that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. For that purpose I yield to him.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 20, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. LOWE. On the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to the silver coinage bill, I am recorded as voting "no." I desire to be recorded as voting in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Journal was then approved.

H. HULMAN AND C. FAIRBANKS.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2008) for the relief of Herman Hulman and Crawford Fairbanks, of the city of Terre Haute, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DISEASES OF DOMESTICATED ANIMALS.

Mr. DIBRELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That there be printed 100,000 copies of Special Report No. 12 of the Commissioner of Agriculture, containing the reports of the examiners appointed to investigate the diseases of swine and contagious and infectious diseases incident to other classes of domesticated animals, of which 70,000 copies shall be printed for the use of members of the House, 25,000 for the use of members of the Senate, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at ten minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] is entitled to the floor, and has twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. URNER. When I was interrupted on Saturday last by the expiration of the morning hour I was about saying it was not the purpose of these statutes of the United States to shield and defend guilty parties, the only object being that when the Government of the United States sends out its officers to execute its law if any State authority should arrest him and attempt to try him for what it considered a violation of State law he should have the right to move his case into the United States court, to be dealt with there according to the State law as meted out by the United States court. Now, sir, it seems to me that the law as it now exists is sufficient for that purpose, and I desire to call the attention of the House to section 722 of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

SEC. 722. The jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters conferred on the district and circuit courts by the provisions of this title, and of title "Civil Rights," and of title "Crimes," for the protection of all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and for their vindication, shall be exercised and enforced in conformity with the laws of the United States, so far as such laws are suitable to carry the same into effect; but in all cases where they are not adapted to the object, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies and punish offenses against law, the common law, as modified and changed by the constitution and statutes of the State wherein the court having jurisdiction of such civil or criminal cause is held, so far as the same is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall be extended to and govern the said courts in the trial and disposition of the cause, and, if it is of a criminal nature, in the infliction of punishment on the party found guilty.

Now, that provision of the Revised Statutes covers at least one branch of the cases contemplated by this bill. But in order to make the law apply to all, beyond all controversy and dispute, the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] in the amendment that he has offered, provides this:

That in all subsequent proceedings in said prosecution, the said circuit court shall be governed in all respects, so far as applicable, in the trial, judgment, and punishment of the party (if on the trial the party shall be convicted) by the laws of the State where such criminal prosecution shall have been commenced; and in the execution of any judgment rendered by said circuit court in such cause, the United States marshal of the district in which said circuit court is being holden shall, in all respects, be governed by the laws of such State in the same manner as if said judgment had been rendered by the State court from which such criminal prosecution was transferred.

Now, sir, there can be no doubt as to the right of Congress to regulate the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States so as to make them apply to all cases that may be tried before them, and in support of that view I refer to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Mayor vs. Cooper, reported in 6 Wallace:

As regards all courts of the United States inferior to this tribunal, two things are necessary to create jurisdiction, whether original or appellate. The Constitution must have given to the court the capacity to take it, and an act of Congress must have supplied it. Their concurrence is necessary to vest it. It is the duty of Congress to act for that purpose up to the limits of the granted power. They may fall short of it, but cannot exceed it. To the extent that such action is not taken the power lies dormant. It can be brought into activity in no other way. Jurisdiction, original or appellate, alike comprehensive in either case, may be given. The constitutional boundary-line of both is the same. Every variety and form of appellate jurisdiction within the sphere of the powers, extending as well to the courts of the States as to those of the nation, is permitted. There is no distinction in this respect between civil and criminal causes. Both are within its scope. Nor is it any objection that questions are involved which are not all of a Federal character. If one of the latter exist, if there be a single such impediment in the mass, it is sufficient. That element is decisive upon the subject of jurisdiction. A case in law or equity consists of the right of the one party as well as the other, and may be truly said to arise under the Constitution or a law of the United States whenever its correct decision depends upon the right construction of either.

The rule applies with equal force where the plaintiff claims a right, and where the defendant claims protection, by virtue of one or the other.

It is the right and the duty of the National Government to have its Constitution and laws interpreted and applied by its own judicial tribunals. In cases arising under them, properly brought before it, this court is the final arbiter. The decisions of the courts of the United States, within their sphere of action, are as conclusive as the laws of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution. This is essential to the peace of the nation, and to the vigor and efficiency of the Government. A different principle would lead to the most mischievous consequences. The courts of the several States might determine the same question in different ways. There would be no uniformity of decisions. For every act of an officer, civil or military, of the United States, including alike the highest and the lowest, done under their authority, he would be liable to harassing litigation in the State courts. However regular his conduct, neither the Constitution nor laws of the United States could avail him if the views of those tribunals and of the juries which sit in them should be adverse. The authority which he had served and obeyed would be impotent to protect him. Such a Government would be one of pitiable weakness, and would wholly fail to meet the ends which the framers of the Constitution had in view. They designed to make a Government not only independent and self-sustained, but supreme in every function within the scope of its authority. The judgments of this court have uniformly held that it is so.

Now, the authorities are certainly clear upon this subject; but we are told that we ought to repeal this law in the interest of economy; that there are so many cases brought before the United States courts that it costs too much to the Government to exercise this jurisdiction and give protection to its own officials.

Now, I yield to no man in an earnest desire to secure an economical administration of the Government; but I am opposed to economy being secured at the expense of the rights of the citizen.

Mr. FRYE. This is one of the most important measures under discussion before the House; but the confusion is so great that even I, though sitting immediately in front of the speaker, am unable to hear him.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order; the Chair will endeavor to preserve order.

Mr. Speaker, I was about to observe, and I will repeat, that so far as a desire to secure an economical administration of the Government is concerned I yield to no man; but when that economy is to be secured at the sacrifice of the rights of the citizen, I care not whether it be the humblest citizen in all this land, we should not allow considerations of economy to make us fail to provide for the protection of the rights of the people.

I say there is a constitutional right involved in this law and therefore something more than a question of economy should govern our judgments when we come to pass upon it.

I refer gentlemen who raise this question of economy to an incident that occurred recently in my own county. Why, sir, we have there as moral, as intelligent, and as law-abiding a people as can anywhere be found, yet, sir, since this Congress has been in session, the people of that county, or a portion of them, in broad daylight, without disguise entered a railroad car and took a human being therefrom, hung him to a tree, because of a sense of wrong they experienced. As a matter of economy it was a grand success, but it cannot be pretended that that is the best way to secure the legal rights of the citizen. I refer to this for two reasons; not only to show that economy may be secured without the protection of law, but for the purpose of showing that there are times in which men's judgment, even in communities like that, are liable to be swayed by passion. We should give this right of removal to United States courts, that whenever the law comes to be executed in a community in which it may be unpopular, in which the passions of the people may be aroused against the enforcement of the law, that we shall not leave our officers, sent out as the agents of the Government, to be dealt with according to the passions and prejudices of the people in that community.

Why, Mr. Speaker, when the fugitive-slave law was in operation, when a United States marshal was sent to Boston, for instance, to execute the law, suppose in the execution of the law he had committed a homicide, would you have left that officer there to the tender mercies of a Massachusetts jury? Or, when, years ago, in the days of the nullification laws, when it was unpopular to execute the revenue laws in South Carolina, would it have been right to have left the officers of the Government to the tender mercies of South Carolina juries? It may again occur in the future of this Government that laws enacted by Congress may be exceedingly unpopular in certain localities and the prejudices of the people may be aroused against their enforcement, and we should not remove the right of officers of the Government to be protected by the Government.

We are told that there is a conflict here with State sovereignty, but that question has been referred to by the Supreme Court. Judge Story says:

> It has been argued that such an appellate jurisdiction over State courts is inconsistent with the genius of our governments and the spirit of the Constitution; that the latter was never designed to act upon State sovereignties, but only upon the people, and that if the power exists it will materially impair the sovereignty of the States and the independence of their courts. We cannot yield to the force of this reasoning; it assumes principles which we cannot admit and draws conclusions to which we do not yield our assent.
> It is a mistake that the Constitution was not designed to operate upon States in their corporate capacities. It is crowded with provisions which restrain or annul the sovereignty of the States in some of the highest branches of their prerogatives. The tenth section of the first article contains a long list of disabilities and prohibitions imposed upon the States. Surely when such essential portions of State sovereignty are taken away or prohibited to be exercised, it cannot be correctly asserted that the Constitution does not act upon the States.
> The language of the Constitution is also imperative upon the States as to the performance of many duties. It is imperative upon the State Legislatures to make laws prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, and for electors of President and Vice-President. And in these, as well as some other cases, Congress have a right to revise, amend, or supersede the laws which may be passed by State Legislatures.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. URNER. I would like very much to do so, but my time is so limited that I must decline.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the reason of the law applies with more force in the case of States than it does in cases between citizens. Why, sir, in the paragraph that I read on Saturday last from the Federalist, the language of Hamilton applies with great force. Take the case between the State and the citizen, where the party is indicted. He is indicted for something that is charged to be against the peace, government, and dignity of the State. What constitutes the State? Why, all three of its branches—the executive, legislative, and judicial. The judicial power of a State is a part of the government of a State, and the criminal suit is between the party charged and the government of a State. The courts of a State are a part of the government of the State. Mr. Hamilton says:

> No man ought certainly to be a judge in his own cause, or in any cause in respect to which he has the least interest or bias. This principle has no inconsiderable weight in designating the Federal courts as the proper tribunals for the determination of controversies between different States and their citizens.

It is true that when citizens of a State are indicted in the courts of their own States they cannot complain; they are a part of the people of that State; they go voluntarily into the State and become members of its body-politic, and are of course subject to its laws.

But when the Government sends its officer into a particular State and a contest arises as between that officer and the State, he finds himself within the territorial jurisdiction of the State court, not by his own volition but by direction of his Government, and then the courts of the United States ought to pass upon the question in controversy.

Why, sir, is this question of State rights never to be settled? We had supposed that it was settled by the war. We know it was a vexed question that gave rise to bitter controversy in the past. But it was finally submitted to the arbitrament of the sword, and after four long years of sanguinary contest the verdict was rendered, we thought, in unmistakable terms. That verdict was, that the United States is a nation, sovereign and supreme, and that its powers, exercised within the sphere of its Constitution, are the only powers that are sovereign and supreme in all this broad land of ours. We ask for judgment upon the verdict, and we ask that that judgment shall be irreversibly recorded not only in the legislation of the country but in the hearts and consciences of the people, so that all the people in all this land shall yield a willing obedience to the provisions of the Constitution and the laws that are passed in accordance therewith, feeling and realizing, as they ought and must, that in this land there is but one power that is sovereign and supreme and that is the power of the Government of the United States.

I am instructed by the committee of which I am a member before taking my seat to demand the previous question on this bill, which I now do.

Mr. FRYE. And pending that demand I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was taken upon the motion to lay on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 70, noes 89.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. FRYE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If gentlemen want to use up the morning hour we might as well have the yeas and nays at once. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 112, not voting 75, as follows:

Mr. HARMER. My colleague, Mr. BINGHAM, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. FROST. Mr. BINGHAM, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I was announced on last Saturday as being paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. OVERTON. I desire to say that my pair applies only to the coinage bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a privileged motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the motion to reconsider will be laid on the table.

Mr. CONGER. I object. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. On the motion to lay on the table, or on the motion to reconsider?

Mr. CONGER. On the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Michigan rise to move a reconsideration?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLYMER. Has the gentleman that right? How did he vote?

Mr. CONGER. I voted in the negative, on purpose to have the right to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The negative is the prevailing side; and the gentleman has the right to make the motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to withdraw that motion, and to demand the previous question on the third reading and engrossment of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CONGER. But I rise to a privileged question, and I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How can the gentleman do that when I am upon the floor?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is a privileged question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I do not withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan, who has moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the bill on the table, as he has right to recognition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the yeas and nays for the present.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 92.

Mr. CONGER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, more than one-fifth have voted for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair might think so, but others might not. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. Sixty is more than one-fifth of a full House.

Mr. CONGER. Let us have tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will conform to the rule.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER, and Mr. HARRIS of Virginia, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 69, more than one-fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 96, not voting 72; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am paired with Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. FINLEY. I am paired with Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. NEW. My colleague from Indiana, Mr. MYERS, is paired with my colleague, Mr. COWGILL. If present, Mr. MYERS would vote "ay."

Mr. ARMFIELD. My colleague from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with Mr. FISHER, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. COFFROTH. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. BACHMAN, is paired with Mr. STARIN, of New York. My colleague, Mr. KLOTZ, is paired with Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My colleagues, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague from Florida, Mr. HULL, is paired with Mr. VOORHIS, of New Jersey.

Mr. SIMONTON. I am paired with Mr. KEIFER, of Ohio. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. BEALE. I am paired with my colleague from Virginia, Mr. JORGENSEN.

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with Mr. PRESCOTT, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I should vote "ay."

Mr. COBB. My colleague from Indiana, Mr. COLERICK, is paired with Mr. BALLOU, of Rhode Island. If present, Mr. COLERICK would vote "ay."

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. PRESCOTT, of New York, is paired with Mr. RICHMOND, of Virginia. If present, Mr. PRESCOTT would vote "no."

Mr. ROBESON. My colleague from New Jersey, Mr. VOORHIS, is paired with Mr. HULL, of Florida.

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired with my colleague from New York, Mr. LOUNSBERY.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Mr. JORGENSEN, of Virginia, is paired with Mr. BEALE, of Virginia.

Mr. SAPP. My colleague from Iowa, Mr. PRICE, is paired with Mr. BUCKNER, of Missouri. If present, Mr. PRICE would vote "no."

Mr. WHITE. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. OVERTON, was paired with Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey, but I understand his pair has been transferred to Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. My colleague from New York, Mr. LAPHAM, is absent and is paired with Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia. If present, Mr. LAPHAM would vote "no."

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND, is paired with Mr. MILLER, of New York.

Mr. HUNTON. I am paired with Mr. HISCOCK, of New York.

Mr. HARMER. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. BINGHAM, is paired with Mr. FROST, of Missouri.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am paired with Mr. HENKLE, of Maryland.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to interrupt the announcement of the result?

Mr. CONGER. I desire the list to be read, but as that will take up so much time from the silver bill I think the reading might be postponed till the next morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The House has directed the yeas and nays to be taken and the Chair thinks that the order of the House should be executed.

Mr. CONGER. I do not desire to interfere with the calling of the roll. I did not make the point while the roll was being called that the morning hour had expired. But I think the reading of the list may be dispensed with until the next morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I submit that the roll-call must be completed and the result of the vote declared.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged motion, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. It seems hard to postpone the consideration of the silver bill by reading the names when they might as well be read in the morning hour. I merely wished to have a ruling from the Chair on the point.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business coming over from Saturday, being the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes. The pending question is on agreeing to the third section as amended.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 3520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3520. Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into bars, or into standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, for his benefit, and no deposit of silver for other coinage shall be received; and silver bullion contained in gold deposits, and separated therefrom, may be paid for in silver coin: Provided, That it shall be lawful to refuse at the mint any deposit of bullion of less value than $100 and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint."

Mr. WHITE. Does the previous question operate on that?

Mr. BELFORD. I understood there was an amendment pending, which was offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN.]

The SPEAKER. The previous question cut of all amendments except two, and those two have been voted on.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. The amendment I offer is to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert a substitute. I understand that will be in order after all the sections have been considered and adopted separately. Am I correct?

The SPEAKER. It would then be in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and substitute whatever the gentleman might see fit to offer.

Mr. WARNER. I reserve all points of order.

Mr. MILLS. Would it be in order now to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not while the previous question is operating.

Mr. CONGER. As there are amendments which it has been refused to admit, contrary, as I believe, to the understanding that was come to, I move to lay this section on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would not be in order. The remedy of the gentleman from Michigan would be to vote against the section.

Mr. CONGER. Well; but is not the motion to lay on the table always in order, even after the previous question has been seconded?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will reflect and see whether the motion to lay on the table has ever been applied to a section of a bill.

Mr. CONGER. The proposition to lay upon the table applies to whatever the previous question is operating upon, whether to the bill, section, or amendment. The consequence would be that it carried the bill with it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be a duplication, but the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. CONGER. My object is to force the gentleman to stand by the agreement as to the admission of amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] had better understand the effect of the motion. The motion would kill the bill.

Mr. WARNER. I object and call for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. The agreement was that the amendment of Mr. FORT should be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The duty of the Chair is to execute the rule.

Mr. CONGER. I know that; but it is for that reason that I desire to make the motion.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will not deny that he agreed that my amendment should come in and be voted upon.

Mr. CONGER. He did it right here on this side, and we all heard it

Mr. WARNER. I know of no other arrangement but that which has been carried out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion to lay the section on the table.

Mr. COX. Would that carry the bill with it?

The SPEAKER. It would. The Chair gives such construction to the motion.

Mr. COX. Is not that an unusual motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not remember such motion to have ever been made under such condition, but it is, however, in order under the rules.

Mr. COX. Then a bill of fifty sections might have fifty motions made to lay the sections on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how he can refuse to recognize the motion. The effect of it would be to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WARNER. Would this motion be in order on every section?

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion.

Mr. COX. Is the House now acting as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. If the House were acting in Committee of the Whole could a motion be made to lay on the table a single section? Would not the motion be to strike out the enacting clause?

The SPEAKER. The motion usually made in Committee of the Whole is to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, an equivalent motion.

Mr. COX. But can you move to lay on the table separate sections?

Mr. MILLS. It is equivalent to striking out the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will be kind enough to read the rule he will find that a motion to lay on the table is always in order.

Mr. COX. Not in Committee of the Whole, and the House is now proceeding as in Committee of the Whole. In the committee the proper motion would be to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. This is an equivalent motion.

Mr. CONGER. The Manual tells us that "in general whatever adheres to the subject of this motion goes on the table with it, as for example where a motion to amend is ordered to lie on the table the subject which it proposes to amend goes there with it." That is from Cushing's Manual.

The SPEAKER. That is the general parliamentary law. The Chair thought fit to admonish the gentleman who had charge of the bill what the effect of the motion was.

Mr. WARNER. I understand that the effect of the motion would be to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That is the effect.

Mr. WARNER. Does the Chair rule that to be in order?

Mr. COX. Will the Chair have the rule read?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 42.

The Clerk read as follows:

When a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day and at the same stage of the bill or proposition.

Mr. COX. That still does not say how you can lay a bill upon the table when acting in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the Manual on that point.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to lay on the table takes precedence of every other motion but a motion to adjourn.

Mr. COX. Still that does not answer the question, which is, that you can take a section out of the bill, and by passing upon that lay the whole bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes that the effect of the motion to lay the section on the table, if carried, would be to lay on the table the whole bill, and thus to kill the bill.

Mr. COX. It is an indirect way of getting at the vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would be sad, but still I think we could bear it.

The SPEAKER. If the judgment of the House is against killing the bill it would naturally vote against this motion.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is there any motion that would lay this section on the table and leave the balance of the bill for consideration? Is there any motion by which this section can be laid on the table without carrying the whole bill to the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. McMAHON. I think this is a very good point to vote upon. A great many gentlemen on the other side pretend to be in favor of a silver bill of some kind or other. We want to see where they stand.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman need not trouble himself about this side of the House. This side of the House know what they are about just as well as do the other side.

Mr. McMAHON. Then vote upon this proposition, and we will see where you are.

Mr. FORT. This side of the House want to vote fairly and squarely upon a proposition which will determine whether we are to have silver at what it is really worth or at its coin value.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to lay this third section upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS and Mr. WARNER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 116, not voting 57; as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that in admitting the motion to lay on the table the third section he was governed first by the consideration that a motion to lay on the table is in order at any time or "at any stage of the proceedings between the demand for the previous question and the final action by the House under it." In general the motion to lay on the table carries with it the subject-matter. The exceptions to this rule were settled during the Twenty-ninth Congress, and are amendments to the Journal, appeals, motions for the previous question, motions to postpone to a specified day, and motions to postpone indefinitely; and there is, however, another exception, as the Chair thinks, and that is a motion to reconsider.

The Chair has been induced to make this statement to show to the House that he was governed by the practice in past Congresses in ruling as he did that a motion to lay upon the table the third section of this bill carried the entire bill with it.

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. WARNER. Regular order! I object to everything that is not absolutely in order.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman hear me a moment?

Mr. WARNER. On what point?

Mr. CONGER. That I was about to state. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. WARNER. Vote! Regular order!

Mr. CONGER. I rise to make a request in behalf of those who feel aggrieved by the previous question cutting off the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] to ask the gentleman to admit that amendment to be voted on.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not that one of those understandings the Chair feels himself bound to carry out? It was the understanding—it was the promise that that amendment should be allowed to be voted on.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is on the motion to agree to the third section as amended.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman refuses that, I desire to say that those of us who wished to vote on that question will not vote on the section at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third section as amended.

Mr. CONGER. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 3.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. CONGER and Mr. WARNER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 7.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. COX. I move there be a call of the House.

Mr. FORT. I hope opportunity will be afforded to offer my amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is there any remedy for this revolutionary proceeding on the other side of the House? [Laughter on the republican side.]

The SPEAKER. A partial remedy is in a call of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The remedy, in my judgment, would be to allow a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CLYMER. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to relieve this House of its present difficulty by permitting the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to be voted on. I will say here that, while I may not vote for that amendment, I chanced to occupy the chair at the time the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois had their discussion with reference to that proposed amendment, and it was clearly my understanding that at the proper time and in the proper place opportunity would be afforded to have it offered and voted on.

I must say this in justice to the facts as they occurred while I occupied the chair temporarily. That, certainly, was the understanding, and I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to permit a vote to be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I wish to add it was the universal understanding of this side of the House.

Mr. WARNER. Whatever may have been the understanding, I wish to say in regard to that that I have entered into no agreement and no arrangement by which amendments to the sections in other order than under the rules should be permitted to come in and be voted on, and when I called the previous question upon pending amendments it was on amendments admitted and pending under the rule. I had no understanding that any other amendments were to be offered. But I will decide in a moment about this.

Mr. CLYMER. I know, Mr. Speaker, [cries of "Regular order!"] I am not in order and that I am proceeding by general consent, but I have made the suggestion in the interest of harmony and the business of the House. While I know the gentleman from Ohio cannot consent to admit any amendment beyond a certain degree when the previous question is pending, yet I do say that in common fairness opportunity should be permitted for a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois under the understanding which I have stated. I make this statement although I will not support the amendment myself.

Mr. FORT. One word. When my amendment was read and offered no previous question was pending, none had been called for, and none was called for until one or two days afterward. The previous question was not in order on the bill until after the five-minute debate had been entered upon. I offered my amendments on the 14th of the month, and they are published in the RECORD of the 15th. Now, how in the world did they get into the RECORD unless the understanding was that I should be allowed to offer them? And I will say further, as I understand it, the gentlemen on this side of the House rested upon the understanding that amendments might be offered until the previous question was called, to be voted on in their proper order.

Mr. WARNER. While I had no such understanding——

The SPEAKER. In reference to the amendment going into the RECORD, the Chair will state that it was submitted for the purpose of being read for the information of the House, and in that way, of course, it went into the RECORD, but it did not thereby acquire a parliamentary position to be voted on.

Mr. FORT. Was not that just exactly the case with every other amendment that was read up to that time?

The SPEAKER. When members demand the enforcement of the rules the Chair cannot recognize amendments beyond the second degree.

Mr. FORT. But I wish to remind the Chair that the gentleman from Ohio did not demand that the rule should be enforced until two days afterward.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has a remedy. When the question comes to be on the engrossment the gentleman can move a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not if the previous question is pending.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is seconded the House will intimate thereby that it will not admit a substitute. The remedy is nevertheless in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is to the House we appeal to rectify the wrong done to this side.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to say to the House that while I have had no understanding on my part that any amendments that might be offered for the purpose of going into the RECORD should be voted on, still if on that side there was an understanding and expectation that this amendment should be voted on, I hope that a vote will be allowed; but not under the threat of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and not under a proposition to bulldoze us if we do not consent to it. Therefore, I will withdraw the previous question simply to admit a vote on this amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Instead of the previous question being withdrawn, let this be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARNER. Very well; let it be done by common consent without withdrawing the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] may be allowed to be pending and voted upon.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. I now withdraw my motion for a call of the House.

Mr. WARNER. This is practically the same proposition as we have already voted upon.

Mr. FORT. Unanimous consent having been given, I now submit as a substitute for the third section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3, and insert the following:

The owner of any silver bullion may deposit the same in quantities of twenty ounces and over at any mint at its actual market value in the United States not exceeding par, which value shall be ascertained by and under regulations to be prescribed by the Director of the Mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and such owner shall be entitled to receive standard silver dollars in payment therefor, and said bullion so received shall be coined into standard dollars.

The question being put on agreeing to Mr. FORT's substitute for the third section, the Speaker stated that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. WARNER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 118, not voting 63; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 21, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I am recorded as not voting yesterday on the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] to the fourth section of the silver bill was agreed to. I voted "ay."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Journal was then approved.

JURORS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution which I send to the desk. It is merely a resolution asking for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to report to this House any correspondence which he has had with the district attorneys of the several Federal judicial districts of the United States as to the impaneling of jurors in the United States courts.

Mr. FRYE. Was there not a rule adopted a few days since requiring that resolutions of this character should be referred to committees?

The SPEAKER. A rule has been adopted that resolutions of this character may be presented during the morning hour of Monday for reference to the appropriate committees. But the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this resolution shall be adopted now.

Mr. COX. I have no sinister purpose in it, I assure the gentleman. It is merely a resolution asking for information.

Mr. FRYE. I must object.

Mr. COX. If it will satisfy the gentleman from Maine, I will insert the words "if not incompatible with the public service." It will thus be left discretionary with the Attorney-General to furnish the information.

Mr. CONGER. I think it can stand till Monday.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

REPRESENTATIVES OF SOLOMON COHEN.

Mr. NICHOLLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2009) for the relief of the legal representatives of Solomon Cohen, late postmaster at Savannah, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

REPRESENTATIVES OF CYRUS K. OSGOOD.

Mr. NICHOLLS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2010) for the relief of the legal representatives and sureties of Cyrus K. Osgood, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

JURIES.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2011) to prohibit officers of the United States and of the States from serving on juries in the courts of the United States and Territories; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at fourteen minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments. The pending question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I demand a vote on that.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. This is a very important matter, far-reaching in its consequences; and the mind of the House, I think, is not in a condition to discuss it or understand it now. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he will not consent to have the bill referred to the Judiciary Committee or recommitted to his own committee, with the understanding that it will not be brought back at this extra session.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think the mind of the House, with perhaps the exception of the gentleman from Maine, is in a proper condition to consider and dispose of this bill; and for that reason I shall decline to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman, then, to allow further discussion upon this question; there are several gentlemen here who have prepared remarks which they wish to submit to the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will state that as soon as the demand for the previous question is sustained, I shall be willing to yield to gentlemen.

Mr. ATKINS. I object to further discussion in the morning hour. I would ask if it be not admissible to take a subject out of the morning hour, under the amended rule, and refer it to the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I shall object to further discussion under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The previous question would take it out of the morning hour, if it were sustained.

Mr. CONGER. I call for a division on seconding the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman did not rise from his seat when he demanded that call.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will come over here, he will learn whether or not I asked for a division.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. You did not rise from your seat; you only said "divide" while you were sitting in your seat.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, with amendments in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and on a division there were ayes 85, noes none.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers.

The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND, will act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 82, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that there cannot be a call of the House without a count by the Chair first, to ascertain if there be a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. A quorum has not voted; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has a right to move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. CONGER. On seconding the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; that is a vote of the House, and there must be a quorum upon it.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois; and it was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich, N. W.	Colerick,	Hull,	Muller,
Bachman,	Cowgill,	James,	Myers,
Baker,	Crapo,	Jorgensen,	O'Brien,

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CONGER. Upon that question I ask for a division.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 91, noes 22.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would ask if it is necessary to have a quorum voting upon a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call?

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to demand the yeas and nays upon a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to appeal to gentlemen on the other side of the House. [Loud cries of "Regular order" from the republican side of the House.] I call their attention to the fact that by filibustering on the other side they are obstructing the introduction of the appropriation bills and of other legislation. [Loud cries of "Regular order!"]

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois; and there were—yeas 196, nays 6, not voting 83; as follows:

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. CONGER. I object; this is too important a vote to omit the reading of the names.

The names were then read, and the result of the vote announced as above stated.

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House dispensed with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 71, noes 83.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARNER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STEPHENS. How many minutes of the morning hour remain?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will expire at fourteen minutes past one; in about ten minutes.

Mr. WARNER. Let us have tellers, then.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

CORRECTION.

Mr. NEW. I desire to correct the RECORD. I have just discovered that I am recorded as not voting yesterday upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] to the fourth section of the silver bill. I was in my seat, and voted "no."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote is not recorded either on the Journal or in the RECORD.

Mr. NEW. I ask that my vote be recorded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman to record his vote on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] to the fourth section of the silver bill? This additional vote will not change the result.

Mr. CONGER. That was a pretty close vote, and I think we had better not make any change in it.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] says that he did vote.

Mr. NEW. My statement is that I did vote, and I ask that the record may be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always accepts the statement of a member on a matter of this kind.

Mr. NEW. Gentlemen on either side of me remember distinctly that I voted.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman is sufficient.

Mr. NEW'S vote was then recorded in the negative.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. CONGER said: I understand that the reporters have me down in their notes as having objected to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] recording his vote when he stated that he did vote. I understood that the request was to have some vote recorded when the member had not voted. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The vote of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has been recorded. The Chair always takes the statement of the gentleman upon that point.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

KANSAS TRUST RESERVE LANDS.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I observe by this morning's RECORD that the Chair yesterday just before the adjournment referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs a communication from the Secretary of the Interior recommending the passage of a bill for the relief of certain actual settlers upon the Kansas trust reserve lands in Kansas. That properly should go to the Committee on Public Lands, and I ask that it be so referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the change of reference, and it is made accordingly.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2012) to provide for holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine in the city of New York and State of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BRIG KATIE.

Mr. LADD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference to the Committee on Commerce a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the brig Katie.

Mr. KELLEY. I object to the introduction of the bill at this time.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to fix another day for the consideration of the business of the Committee for the District of Columbia, that committee having been cut out of it last Monday. I ask by unanimous consent that Tuesday next at two o'clock be set apart for the consideration of that business with like privileges for the Committee for the District of Columbia which it has under the rules on the third Monday of each month.

Mr. CONGER. Not to interfere with the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The committee have the absolute right to the time after two o'clock on the third Monday of each month.

Mr. FRYE. Why not Monday next?

Mr. HUNTON. The House may adjourn over Monday next and probably cut us out again.

Mr. FRYE. Probably they will not adjourn over. I object.

Mr. WHITE. Why not to-morrow?

Mr. HUNTON. Because we think it better to have Tuesday next.

Mr. FRYE. I will object unless the gentleman will ask for Monday next.

Mr. HUNTON. No; we may be cut out again by an adjournment over.

Mr. CONGER. I will object to any special order in reference to which appropriation bills are not excepted. If the gentleman will make that exception I will not object.

Mr. HUNTON. Very well; I will make that exception.

The SPEAKER. That varies the rule, but it can be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the Committee for the District of Columbia having Tuesday next after two o'clock for the consideration of that business, not to interfere with appropriation bills?

Mr. WHITE. Yes; I object.

Mr. WARNER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of making a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. This is the special order, and the gentleman cannot interrupt it except by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Ohio demands the regular order of business.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent, then, to be allowed to submit a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FRYE. I object.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, I am informed there will be no objection if I ask for to-morrow after two o'clock for the District of Columbia business.

Mr. WARNER. Provided it shall not interfere with the coinage bill if that should go over. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. WARNER. I object unless on that condition.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business coming over from Saturday, being the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes. The pending question is on agreeing to the fourth section as amended.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 3524 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3524. The charges for converting gold and silver bullion into coin shall be the difference between the market value in New York City of the bullion and the legal-tender value of the coin. The charges for melting and refining when bullion is below standard, for toughening when metals are contained in it which render it unfit for coinage, for copper used for alloy when the bullion is above standard, for separating the gold and silver when these metals exist together in the bullion, and for the preparation of bars, shall be fixed from time to time by the Director, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to equal, but not exceed, in their judgment, the actual average cost to each mint and assay office of the material, labor, wastage, and use of machinery employed in each of the cases aforementioned."

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. State it.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to know what will be the effect of the bill if the present question is decided in the negative?

The SPEAKER. If the section, as amended, is voted down, it will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. KNOTT. It will be "dropped out" of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WARNER. But, Mr. Speaker, I have been directed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, if this section is voted down—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to debate.

Mr. WARNER. I have been directed by that committee to move a substitute for section 9.

Mr. REED. That is in the nature of debate. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is in order?

The SPEAKER. Not at this time, because the previous question is not yet exhausted. After the previous question has been exhausted the motion to recommit will be in order.

Mr. BELFORD. I give notice, then, when it is in order I will move to recommit the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

The SPEAKER. It will be time to decide that question when it arises. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays on the fourth section as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 109, not voting 63; as follows:

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. TUCKER, is absent, and is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. LAPHAM.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. WARNER. I now call the previous question on section 5 of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not until the section is read.

The SPEAKER. The section will be read.

The section was read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 3527 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3527. Silver coins of less denominations than $1 shall be paid out at the several mints, and at the assay-office in New York City, to the extent they may be required in exchange for gold coins or the standard silver dollars, or United States notes, at par, in sums not less than $50. It shall be lawful also to transmit parcels of the same, from time to time, to the assistant treasurers, depositaries, and other officers of the United States, for exchange, under general regulations proposed by the Director of the Mint, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. And silver coins of less denominations than $1, when presented at the Treasury or any sub-treasury or depository of the United States, in sums not less than $50, shall be received in exchange for money of full legal tender."

The amendments reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures were to strike out the word "the" before the words "standard silver dollars" in the first part of the section, and toward the end of the section to strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "twenty" before the word "dollars."

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question on the section and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendments reported from the committee were agreed to; and the section, as amended, was then adopted.

Section 6 of the bill was then read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 3585 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3585. The gold coins of the United States and the standard silver dollar shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value, when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, and, when reduced in weight below such standard and tolerance, shall be a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight."

The amendments reported from the committee were to strike out the word "the" before the words "standard silver," and strike out the word "dollar" and insert the word "dollars" after the words "standard silver;" so that it will read "the gold coins of the United States and standard silver dollars shall be a legal tender," &c.

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question on the section and pending amendment.

Mr. WEAVER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Let me see it.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask that it be read.

Mr. WARNER. I will hear it read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to section 6 the following:
The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed and required to cause to be paid out without discrimination standard silver coin belonging to the Government that may at any time be in the Treasury the same as gold coin in liquidation of all kinds of coin obligations against the Government.

Mr. WARNER. I am willing to let that amendment be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. There are two amendments already pending to the section; and that would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to any amendment in the third degree.

Mr. WEAVER. I gave notice that I would introduce this amendment, and it was the understanding all the time that it was pending.

Mr. GARFIELD. It could not have been pending.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken upon the first amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] withdraw his call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that he does.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then let us have some debate on this section.

Mr. REED. If the call for the previous question is withdrawn, then this section is open for debate and further amendment.

Mr. CONGER. If the previous question is not pending, I desire to be heard.

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question on the amendments.

Mr. WHITE. On what amendments?

Mr. WARNER. On the two amendments recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman now to call the previous question on the amendments reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. WARNER. I do; they are merely verbal amendments.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 91.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. WARNER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARNER and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 99, noes 97.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the two amendments reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures were agreed to.

Mr. WEAVER. I now offer the amendment which I send up.

Mr. WARNER. And I call the previous question on the section and the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Is there any amendment pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] submits an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Was not the call for the previous question made before the amendment was submitted?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered on the two amendments recommended by the committee, and those amendments have been disposed of. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] demands the previous question with the understanding that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] comes in.

Mr. WHITE. Was not the previous question called on the section and amendments?

The SPEAKER. It was not; on the amendments only.

Mr. CONGER. If the previous question is demanded, I object to the amendment being read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] states that he allowed the amendment to be offered before he made the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Then the demand for the previous question is not pending?

Mr. McMILLIN. The demand for the previous question is pending on the section and amendment.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair understands the question. The amendment certainly cannot be offered and considered pending if the demand for the previous question is pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio distinctly stated long ago that he would call the previous question on the two amendments which were recommended by the committee so that he would have the opportunity of yielding for this amendment.

Mr. CONGER. If he does so before demanding the previous question it is all right; but if he has demanded the previous question——

The SPEAKER. Why, the amendment was on the desk, in the hands of the Clerk——

Mr. CONGER. But it has not been before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] as entitled to offer the amendment, and it will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 6 the following:
The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed and required to cause to be paid out without discrimination standard silver coin belonging to the Government that may at any time be in the Treasury, the same as gold coin, in liquidation of all kinds of coin obligations against the Government.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question on the section and the amendment. I have done so already.

Mr. CONGER. I addressed the Chair before the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. But I had already demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, in charge of the bill, surely has the right, under all parliamentary practice, to test the sense of the House on ordering the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. But he was conversing, and I first addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] as in charge of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. How long does the gentleman have this right?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized by the Chair as having control of the bill, so as to be entitled to the floor for the purpose of calling the previous question, until the House votes down the demand. If that should be done, the control of the floor would revert to the other side.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question on the section and the amendment of Mr. WEAVER, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 97, noes 93.

The main question was then ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WEAVER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 75, not voting 67; as follows:

The vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. WEAVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to offer an amendment to this section if in order.

Mr. WARNER. It is not in order, as the previous question is still operating.

Mr. GARFIELD. The previous question operated only on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was called on the section and amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. On the eighth section?

The SPEAKER. We have not reached the eighth section yet. The vote is now on the sixth section as amended.

The sixth section, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 3586 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3586. The silver coins of the United States, of smaller denominations than $1, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $20 in any one payment."

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question on the section and pending amendment if there be any.

The SPEAKER. There are none pending.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the section was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 254 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 254. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion, with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations of not less than $5 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for, or representing the certificates of deposit, shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent. beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury; and the certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports."

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question on the section and pending amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the words in this section from line 13, beginning after the word "demand" and running down to the end of the section, are not in order, and that no rule of this House can make them in order.

For the reason that a higher rule than any of our rules prevails, namely, a clause in the Constitution of the United States which I ask the liberty to read. Section 4 of article 14 of the Constitution is in these words:

The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned.

This questions the validity of every item of the public debt payable in coin—of all the interest of the public debt which is payable in coin.

Mr. MCMAHON. Is it a question of order that a law is unconstitutional?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the point in a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am stating the question of order.

Mr. WARNER. That is the law now. This bill does not change the law in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio on the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to be permitted to state it without interruption. This debate has been pustuled all over with interruptions. I call attention to this fact, that here is a clause of the Constitution forbidding the only power that could question it and thereby forbidding this House to question the validity of the public debt, and of course the validity of the contract for its payment. Now, it is palpably known, and the Chair is bound to take historical and judicial notice of it, that our public debt is payable, principal and interest, in coin.

Mr. WARNER. Does this change it?

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague must not interrupt me. Now here is a proposition declaring that the interest on the public debt shall be paid in pieces of paper which are not money.

Mr. WARNER. That is the law now on the statute-book. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. GARFIELD. I doubt if all the power of this House can restrain my colleague.

Mr. FORT. No power can stop him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Here are certificates which are themselves evidences of debt and are not money, and are not here provided to be called money; and these pieces of paper it is provided shall be used to pay the interest of the public debt. Now, that is not only naked repudiation but it is a flat violation of a provision of the Constitution which commands the House as well as the whole Congress, and the Speaker as well as every member of this House, that we shall not question the validity of the public debt.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it is not the duty of the Chair to rule upon the construction of a law. That belongs to the House, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is not the question of the construction of a law, Mr. Speaker. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. FORT. I desire also to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There are several amendments already pending.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman in charge of the bill has agreed that my amendment should be admitted.

Mr. WARNER. I am willing that the amendment of the gentlemen from Colorado shall come in.

The SPEAKER. There are several amendments recommended by the committee. The Chair suggests that they be voted upon first.

Mr. HASKELL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. I claim that this section which we are about to act upon is not germane to the bill. It is a bill to regulate the coinage of the United States, and in the eighth section of this bill is a provision having nothing whatever to do with the coinage of the United States. It specifies not only that the public debt may be paid in paper, but that it may be paid in paper which, when redeemed, may be redeemed in silver bullion. It is no more germane than would be a provision providing that the public debt might be paid in paper redeemable in pig-iron.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. If the point had been made in time the Chair would have considered it, but it comes too late.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have just reached the section, and it was agreed that the bill should be considered by sections. This section has never been under consideration, and we reserved all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late.

Mr. CONGER. All points of order were reserved.

Mr. WARNER. Here is the law now:

And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent. beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury.

That is precisely the language of this section. This bill does not change the law. That is the law now; passed, too, by a republican Congress.

Mr. HASKELL. This section says——

Mr. SPARKS. I rise to a question of order. Has the point of order not been decided?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided it.

Mr. SPARKS. There is but one other thing to be done if a decision of the Chair is not accepted, and that is to appeal from it.

The SPEAKER. This may be in the nature of debate.

Mr. HASKELL. I wish to say on the point of order——

The SPEAKER. The point of order has been decided.

Mr. HASKELL. This says:

Certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the Journal does not show that there were any points of order reserved.

Mr. WARNER. I move the previous question on the committee's amendments to this section.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] states that he himself reserved points of order. I submit the word of a member should be taken when he makes such a statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair consulted with the journal clerk, and is advised by him that no reservation of points of order was made.

Mr. CLAFLIN. When the bill was reported I reserved all points of order.

Mr. McMAHON. I think it is too late now to go back to correct the Journal.

Mr. HASKELL. On that question I desire to say a word. This same point was raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and after a lengthy debate the word of that gentleman was taken. Now, here the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] says he did reserve points of order. His word should also be taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going to find out whether all points of order were reserved, and he will find it out from both the Journal and the RECORD. There is no occasion for any excitement about this matter.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who was standing near me, heard me say that I reserved all points of order.

Mr. WARNER. Unless the RECORD shows that points of order were reserved, they cannot now be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. If repudiation is to go on in the currency, we ought to have it go on here.

Mr. WARNER. This law was passed by a republican Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

COIN AND BULLION CERTIFICATES.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from yesterday is the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that on Saturday next the House will proceed to consider the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that consent ought not to be asked in reference to matters extraneous to the business now before the House. The question had been put on ordering the main question, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] demanded the yeas and nays, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I would like to have the resolution read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That House bill No. 564, and the amendments thereto, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, be made the special order for consideration in the House on Saturday next after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 108.

So the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now cause the RECORD to be read, of the proceedings at the time the bill was reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

COIN AND BULLION CERTIFICATES.

Mr. WARNER also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes; which were ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. WARNER. I now report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, under the privilege granted to that committee, the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That House bill No. 564 and the amendments thereto, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, be made the special order for consideration in the House on Saturday next after the morning hour and from day to day thereafter until disposed of."

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to my colleague to add to that resolution the proviso "not to interfere with appropriation bills." That has always been done in such cases, and is only a fair proposition.

Mr. WARNER. I do not yield for any amendment, but insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to move, as an amendment, that this bill shall not interfere with appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been demanded.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The bill and amendments will be read.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The bill is not pending, but only a resolution on which the gentleman from Ohio has demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules any gentleman has a right to have read a bill on which action is demanded, such as is proposed by the pending resolution.

Mr. COX. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. This is not in the morning hour, but is under the right given to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures by the new rule, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. COX. I thought it was in the morning hour.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That the Committees of Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, and Coinage, Weights, and Measures shall have leave to report at any time; and on motion of any member a majority of the House may fix a day for the consideration of any public bill reported by either of said committees, and the House may continue the consideration of such bill from day to day until disposed of."

The SPEAKER. From this it is right that the House should know what is contained in the bill before they are asked to consider it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The only point I wished settled is this, whether or not it is proper to call for the reading of a bill when the bill is not under consideration, but merely a resolution fixing the time for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it might control the vote of a member to know the provisions of the bill the consideration of which was proposed to be fixed for a certain day.

The bill and amendments were read.

Mr. FORT. Is it proposed to open the bill to discussion and amendment when it comes up for consideration?

Mr. WARNER. The bill will be open to debate and amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. Such is the intention of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The whole subject will be under the control of a majority of the House at the time it comes up for consideration. The pending question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 92.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. WARNER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 102.

The SPEAKER. The tellers report ayes 102, noes 102. The Chair votes in the affirmative and the previous question is seconded. [Applause.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be now put.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ATKINS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. This is not being considered in the morning hour.

Mr. ATKINS. Is a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOUSE. I move the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Neither the Journal nor the RECORD show that there was any reservation of the points of order, but the Chair proposes to take the word of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CLAFLIN.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants now to hear the point of order which the gentleman from Kansas desires to make, when he says that this section is not germane to the bill.

Mr. McMAHON. If the Journal was read the next morning and approved, it seems to me that after a lapse of three weeks it is too late to amend it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule upon the question whether this section is germane to the bill or not.

Mr. HASKELL. The proposition that I make is, that this is a bill relating to the coinage of the United States, providing how and in what way the coins of the United States shall be struck off and how they shall be issued.

Mr. EWING. It relates also to the silver certificates.

Mr. HASKELL. Here is a provision which compels the United States to receive for customs duties bullion certificates, not coin, not money in any sense, and it might be that under the operations of this bill the Treasury of the United States would be flooded from its revenue with bullion merely.

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing this point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. My point of order is, that this section changes the entire tariff laws of the Government and interferes materially with its operations.

The SPEAKER. If Congress desires to do that, it is generally considered that they have the right to do it.

Mr. HASKELL. I say that the section is not germane to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds that this is a bill reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes;" and the section which the gentleman declares is not, in his judgment, germane to this bill, reads as follows:

SEC. 254. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and bullion, with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor, &c.

The language is almost identical between the title of the bill and this section. The Chair thinks the section is germane to the bill, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question upon the two amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that we will be allowed to have debate, for the provision is too important to be voted upon without consideration.

The SPEAKER. The remedy is in the House; they may vote down the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I hope they will take that remedy.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. [Loud cries of "Regular order!" from the democratic side of the House.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. I know very well that the Chair will hear me, but those unruly members do not want to hear me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please state the question he desires to ask.

Mr. CONGER. I will do it when I have an opportunity.

The House was asked to consider this bill as in Committee of the Whole. In Committee of the Whole we have the right to offer amendments, as there is no previous question. We have the right to debate under the five-minute rule, and the bill was placed in the House as under the five-minute rule. There has been no debate as yet on this section under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. There are not less than five amendments pending to this section.

Mr. CONGER. There has been no debate upon it.

The SPEAKER. The House has its remedy. It can refuse debate by sustaining the demand for the previous question. If the House wants debate it can vote down the demand for the previous question. Of course, the majority will control the matter.

Mr. CONGER. I know this House could order debate to be closed, but there has been no such order made.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. CONGER. That is not the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is sustained, of course that cuts off debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will again indicate his motion.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question on the amendments reported from the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. That cannot be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call the previous question on the first two amendments.

Mr. WARNER. I make that motion.

The question was taken upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 98, noes 2.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. GARFIELD. There never will on this.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. WARNER] will permit this section to be discussed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope not.

Mr. MILLS. It is utterly useless to try to drive the minority when we have not a quorum on our side here. I have been in the minority myself and helped to do what the minority on the other side is now doing, and we in the minority have always compelled the majority to yield. There is no use for the majority to attempt to drive the minority when they have not a quorum here on their side.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let us try it, anyhow.

Mr. MILLS. Well, go on and try it; but you will have to give up.

Mr. COX. I give notice now that when it is in order I will offer a resolution to amend the rules so as to compel the minority to vote. [Laughter on the republican side.] Oh, you may laugh now, but if we deduct your per diem I think you will vote. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring that gentleman over here. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. You cannot change the rules without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted upon seconding the demand for the previous question, the Chair will appoint Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. CONGER, of Michigan, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 92, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. WARNER. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich, N. W.	Ellis,	Killinger,	Pound,
Bachman,	Fisher,	Kimmel,	Prescott,
Ballou,	Forsythe,	Kitchin,	Price,

Dick,	Ketcham,	Pierce,	Young, Casey.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-nine members have answered to their names—more than a quorum. If there be no objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question again recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the first two amendments reported by the committee to the pending section.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 96, noes 96.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 114, not voting 66; as follows:

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired with Mr. LOUNSBERY.

Mr. AIKEN. My colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, who is absent, is paired with Mr. CAMP. If my colleague were present, he would vote "no."

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with Mr. KNOTT.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. TUCKER is paired with Mr. LAPHAM.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. VOORHIS, of New Jersey.

On motion of Mr. RICHMOND, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WARNER. Regular order!

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I move to lay the eighth section on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. That will take the bill with it.

Mr. BREWER. That is just what we want.

Mr. WARNER. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is. The effect is to lay the bill on the table, and the motion is in order either before or after the previous question.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether it would be in order for those who have the control of the bill to accept an amendment by striking out, in the fourteenth line, the words "may be used in payment of interest on the public debt," so as to obviate, if possible, the objection to the clause?

Mr. WARNER. If the meaning of that is that silver shall not be used in the payment of the public debt, I propose to meet that question here and now. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on, as he does not seem to have had any opportunity at any time to be heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIGHT. If the remark was made to me, I will state I am not behind the gentleman from Ohio in relation to the silver proposition.

Mr. WARNER. I had no reference to the gentleman from Tennessee at all.

Mr. BRIGHT. I claim to have been the first man in Congress to dig it up and advocate it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the motion to lay on the table will not be made, as that will take the bill with it.

Mr. EWING. I understand this takes the whole bill on the table with it.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. EWING. Then a vote to lay on the table is a vote against the whole bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 102.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to lay the eighth section on the table.

Mr. BREWER. It is evident we cannot pass the bill to-night, and I therefore move the House adjourn.

Mr. EWING. I demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 30.

The SPEAKER. Not one-fifth.

Mr. EWING. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 100.

Mr. WHITE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BREWER and Mr. EWING were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 93.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the vote on the motion to adjourn the Chair wishes to ask unanimous consent.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. EINSTEIN, indefinitely, on account of important business;

To Mr. LAPHAM, indefinitely, on account of the sickness of relatives.

To Mr. MILES, for the remainder of the session;

To Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, for the remainder of the session; and

To Mr. POUND, until Saturday next.

GEORGE W. BALLOU.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of George W. Ballou, no adverse report having been made.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Mr. EWING. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House refused to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. EWING. No, I withdrew the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] states that he withdrew the demand for the yeas and nays, and the Chair will submit the request again.

The question being taken, there were ayes 50, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make the point of order that the yeas and nays have been once refused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought so, but the gentleman from Ohio states that he withdrew the demand for the yeas and nays, and that being the case the Chair is doing his duty in submitting the question again.

Mr. WHITE. I submit the Chair stated that a sufficient number had not risen to order the yeas and nays, and many gentlemen have left the House under the impression that the yeas and nays would not be taken.

The SPEAKER. Even then, those asking for the yeas and nays had a right to a further count. The Chair thinks he could not arbitrarily rule that the question had been decided.

Mr. WHITE. The Chair announced that the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under that impression.

Mr. REED. And a large number of gentlemen left the Hall in consequence.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

REPORT OF CAPTAIN M. R. BROWN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting Captain M. R. Brown's eleventh report showing the condition of the South Pass of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARNER. There having been intervening business, I move that the House do now adjourn. [Laughter upon the republican side of the House.]

Mr. WHITE. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only seven members voting therefor.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 22, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of David Wingate, of Rochester, New Hampshire, representing that he was impressed into the service of the British navy on the 31st of December, 1811, and served until November 1, 1812, and was retained thereafter as a prisoner until April 26, 1815, and praying for the passage of a law by Congress granting him compensation for the period during which he was in that service and a prisoner; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented the petition of members of the Star-in-the-West Grange, No. 6, of Minnesota, praying for the passage of the bill "to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

USE OF TROOPS.

Mr. MCDONALD. I now move for leave to bring in the bill of which I gave notice at the last meeting of the Senate, authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves for leave to bring in a bill of which he gave notice on Tuesday last. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read, Mr. President.

The Secretary read the proposed bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Indiana whether the bill which he asks leave to bring in is intended to enlarge or to diminish the existing lawful and constitutional powers of the President of the United States in the respects to which the bill refers?

Mr. MCDONALD. I apprehend the Senator from Vermont will be able to determine that question when he comes to examine the bill. According to my judgment, it puts the exercise of the power under proper constitutional restraints. Whether it enlarges or diminishes the authority of the President, is a question which will have to be determined by an examination of the bill itself.

In moving for leave this morning to introduce the bill, I desire simply that it shall be read this morning the first time, and lie on the table until Monday morning when I shall call it up for the purpose of referring it or acting upon it; and I shall have something to say in regard to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry that the Senator from Indiana is not able to give me the information as to the scope of his own bill which I asked for, and that is whether it enlarges or diminishes the present powers of the President, whether it is a diminution of existing powers or an increase of them.

While I am up I should like to know of the honorable Senator who must have thought of the subject, whether in his opinion the effect of the bill is to repeal the present existing statutes upon the subject, or whether it is merely an additional provision that leaves the pre-existing laws in force; and then I should like to know what is the present necessity in his judgment for any legislation upon this subject other than such as now exists upon the statute-book?

Mr. MCDONALD. As to the force and effect of the bill in repealing the existing laws, the declaration of the repealing section is that all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of the bill shall be repealed. The particular statutes that were in my mind in framing the bill and in framing the repealing clause of the bill were the first three sections of the statutes under the title, "Insurrection," as they appear in the Revised Statutes.

As to the necessity of introducing a measure of this kind, I shall undertake to dwell on that considerably more at length when I come to submit such views as I may have upon the bill, which I did not propose to do this morning, because I do not desire to interfere with the special order taken up at the last session of the Senate in reference to the provisions that ought to be passed to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into this country. I prefer that the special order shall be proceeded with to its close without being interrupted by any consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the President will put the question instead of calling for objections. I am quite unable to see that there is any necessity for present legislation upon the topics covered by the bill. It is quite different, perhaps, from the extremely dangerous condition of the country about the use of the military power on election days that we have been so unfortunate as not to redress and secure. I was looking with some interest and expectation to the presentation of a bill which should guard the inalienable rights of citizens of the United States against any assistance in the exertion of their rights on election days; but that has not seemed to have been forthcoming, and now we have gone back to the question of the general use of the Army in the execution of the laws and in the repelling of invasions, &c., upon which I had not heard until now that there was supposed to be any defect or unconstitutional quality in the existing statutes. But as my honorable friend wishes to deliver a more formal address upon this subject to explain his bill more fully than now, as he does not appear to be ready, I shall not ask a division on the question of his having leave to bring it in. If I understand him, he wishes to address the Senate on Monday next upon the subject?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And then to have the bill referred to a committee or put on its passage?

Mr. McDONALD. My motion then will be to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the Senator from Vermont and myself are both members, when we shall have full opportunity to sit down together and consider its terms and its importance and necessity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves for leave to bring in the bill that has been read. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. McDONALD. Now I move that the bill lie on the table for the present, and I give notice that I shall call it up on Monday at the close of morning business, and have it read the second time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to give notice that I shall ask to speak to the bill following the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that imply? Well, I give notice that I wish to speak upon it when I can get the floor under the rules.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 605) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 206) relating to the transportation of animals, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879, reported it without amendment.

LOUISIANA ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BAILEY reported the following resolution from the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation directed by the resolution of the Senate of May 7, 1879, to be made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether a resolution of this kind is necessary? I do not know that there is the slightest objection to it; but when a committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, &c., does it require a separate resolution of the Senate to provide for the payment of its expenses?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not know what may have been the course of the Senate or of its committees heretofore, but the Committee on Privileges and Elections directed the resolution to be reported to the Senate for the reason that it considered it proper, at all events, if not necessary to have the authority to expend the money as stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the impression that the practice has always been, there being a contingent fund of the Senate provided by law, that when the Senate authorizes a committee to incur expenses they are chargeable upon that fund as a matter of course. The only possible objection to the resolution would be that it would seem to establish a precedent that might embarrass the accounting officers of the Treasury in respect of other committees now incurring expenses in one little way and another of the same sort, occasionally. For instance, the Judiciary Committee has been directed to make a particular inquiry, and it is going to have a witness or two, upon a certain matter. If the vouchers from one committee go to the Treasury fortified by an additional resolution of the Senate and not from another committee, it may possibly produce difficulty; I do not know that it will. I had the impression that it was clear that accounts were always passed against the contingent fund where it appeared from a resolution of the Senate that the committee which had incurred the expense had authority to incur it and that it did not require an additional resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. The rules provide for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, the rules provide as to what committee shall audit and control the expenses. It may be that in one aspect, if that is what the design of the committee is, this resolution is necessary. It provides, I think, that the vouchers shall be passed on the certificate of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I think the rules provide in regard to all charges on the contingent fund that the vouchers shall be passed on the approval of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If the object of the resolution is to take the approval of the vouchers out from under that rule and to leave the approval to the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, then undoubtedly it is necessary. If that is the object of it, I do not know that I have the slightest objection to it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it has always been the custom in the investigations of committees, as the committee generally make their investigations away from the city, that the allowances have been approved by the chairman. I think that was the course pursued by the late Senator Morton in the investigation in Oregon. I will say further that in order to have no difficulty in paying the accounts allowed the cashier of the Senate was consulted in reference to this matter, and the resolution was prepared in accordance with his suggestion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My attention was called to a similar case the other day, and on an examination of the statutes and of the former proceedings of the Senate in several cases—of course I did not look them all through—I thought it was clear, and it appeared to be clear, in practice, because accounts had been passed at the Treasury in that way, that there was no necessity for resolutions of this character, as whatever the Committee on Contingent Expenses passed, no matter what the expense was, passed through the Treasury as against the contingent fund. But if it is more convenient that the chairman of a particular committee alone, and not the committee provided by the rules for that purpose to audit the contingent expenses, shall audit these expenses, and the majority of the Chamber think that is the best way, I have not anything in the world to say on that point.

Mr. BAILEY. I will suggest to the Senator from Vermont that at the last session of Congress the Teller committee, which was appointed by the Senate to make an investigation, audited the expenses through its chairman, and my information is that that has been the usual course. I know that it was so in the case of the Teller committee. The course recommended by the Committee on Privileges and Elections is so obviously right and so obviously convenient that it seems to me the resolution ought to be adopted. Instead of referring the expenses of that committee to another committee to audit it can be better done by the chairman of the committee, who himself is acquainted with what has been done and knows what vouchers may properly be certified.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the resolution be adopted it will place the necessary funds practically in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the expenditures can be made under his direction. If the resolution be not adopted the funds will remain in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate, and the expenditures must be made under his direction. There was no similar resolution adopted by the Senate with regard to the expenditures made by the Teller committee, and in consequence of that the Secretary of the Senate had to send a clerk from his office with the committee; and as the expenditures were incurred they were paid by the clerk sent from the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and they were afterward, of course, passed upon by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is much more convenient to have the necessary funds placed subject to the control of the chairman of the committee, and that usually has been done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My understanding of matters of this kind, and that was the case in the Oregon investigation, is that the chairman of the committee drew his order at different times upon the Secretary, who honored his draft. The chairman of the committee approved the bills for witness fees and other things, and had them paid out of the funds which he drew upon this order on the Secretary, and when he came back he settled his accounts with the Secretary, as I understand. That is the usual course pursued, I believe.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is the question before the Senate whether the resolution shall be considered at present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think this investigation is not one of the usual character of investigations by the committees of the Senate. I think this proceeding inaugurates what will result in an unusual precedent, and a very dangerous precedent. I think it threatens the existence of the Senate, really; and, for that reason, every resolution offered relating to the matter should take the usual course. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Before the Senator objects, will he allow me to read a section of the Revised Statutes which I think controls the whole thing?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. The seventy-sixth section of the Revised Statutes is in these words:

No payment shall be made from the contingent fund of either House of Congress, unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, or the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

Therefore no resolution of the Senate would take this matter out of the hands of the regular committee to audit the contingent expenses; and whatever may be the form, every account would have to go through that committee, or else it would not pass at the Treasury Department.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is true; but without a resolution of this kind how would the Secretary know anything about it, unless the orders were indorsed and approved by the chairman of the committee? For instance, the chairman of the committee might be in New Orleans. How would the Secretary know anything about the character of the vouchers, unless they were approved by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. DAWES. The resolution is very proper indeed, viewed in that way, but I understand the resolution to require the payment to be made upon the voucher of the chairman without the examination of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. That cannot be done. That would seem to supersede the necessity of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. It is very proper that the Committee on Contingent Expenses should have just what this resolution suggests, or they would not know what to allow; but the Secretary cannot pay the money upon such an indorsement, as the Senator will see. After all that is done it has to pass the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suppose that to be a matter of mere form, as all our accounts are rendered by the chairmen of the committees.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator that he conform the resolution to the phraseology of the section which I have read from the Revised Statutes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say that the cashier of the Secretary was consulted in reference to the form of this resolution, and the resolution was put in its present form by his approbation.

Mr. DAWES. I am not interfering. I having been upon that committee once, found myself somewhat embarrassed by these informal resolutions not conforming to section 76 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I think the only practical difference that exists between the modes of paying expenses is that if the account is payable upon the order or voucher of the chairman the money can be drawn in advance, so as to have it on hand to pay the expenses as they are incurred; while if it is left as the rule and the law leave it, to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, then it cannot be paid until after the expenditures are made and the voucher goes to the committee. That is the only practical difference, I think.

Mr. McMILLAN. I renew the objection I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota objects to the present consideration of the resolution, and, therefore, it will go over until to-morrow.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 622) regulating intercourse with the subjects of the Chinese Empire visiting or residing in the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. Without previous notice I desire to introduce a bill at the request of one of my constituents, an honorable and reputable gentleman. I have not read the bill and do not desire to commit myself to its provisions or against them.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 623) to provide for the construction and completion of certain transcontinental lines of railway, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

SURVEYS OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN REGION.

Mr. HEREFORD (by request) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of volume 2 of the geological series of the reports of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, entitled, The Geology of the Henry Mountains, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 500 for the use of the survey; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. HEREFORD (by request) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 2,000 copies of volume 4 of the geological series of the reports of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, entitled, Geology of the Black Hills of Dakota, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, and 500 for the use of the Department of the Interior; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A VESSEL.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred House bill No. 178, direct me to report the same back without amendment favorably. I am going to ask to have this bill considered now unless some Senator sees objection to it; and as part of the request I will state what it is.

There is a boat plying on the Hudson River between New York and Peekskill. She is owned by a gentleman very well known to members of this body and otherwise. She is not an old boat, but a new and good one. She is named after a foreign prince. He wants to change her name to the name of one of the cities to which she plies, he being the owner of several other boats and they being all similar in name, this being the sole exception; he wants to uniform the names of the boats which constitute his line.

This bill simply permits the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the name of this vessel to be changed to Riverdale. I have in hand the proof that she is seaworthy, that there are no mechanics' liens, and that all other things which the Committee on Commerce is accustomed to require have been complied with. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 20th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 141) for the removal of the political disabilities of John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business and nothing is moved, the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end and lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 108.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the substitute reported on the 9th of May by the select committee be taken up and considered as the original bill without reference to the original bill, and that the substitute be now reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the substitute will be considered for purposes of amendment as the original bill. The substitute will now be reported to the Senate.

The substitute was read.

Mr. HARRIS. I find a number of clerical and typographical errors in the print of this bill, and before proceeding to consider it I desire to correct by amendments the various errors of that character without changing the substance or sense of the bill at all.

In line 20 of section 1, I move to strike out the word "internal."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. In section 2, line 5, I move to strike out the word "for" and insert "forth."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be made.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 31, section 2, I move to strike out the word "internal," the last word in the line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 14, section 3, I move to strike out the capital "A" and insert a small "a," and to change the semicolon before it to a comma; and then, in line 18 of the same section, after the word "another," a comma should be inserted instead of a period, and the capital "T" in the word "The" should be stricken out and a small "t" inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection these amendments will be made.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 26 of the same section, after the word "promulgated," I move to insert the words "by the National Board of Health."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be made.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 3 of section 5 I move to strike out the word "part" and insert "port."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 13 of section 9, after the word "reports," the period should be stricken out and a comma inserted, and the capital "A" in the next word "And," immediately after that, should be changed to a small "a."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made.

Mr. INGALLS. While the Senator from Tennessee is on that branch of the bill I would suggest that in line 9 of section 3, the word "and" should be stricken out and the word "where" substituted, so as to read:

And at such ports and places within the United States as have no quarantine regulations under State authority, where such regulations are, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. I adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas to strike out "and" and insert "where."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

The substitute, as amended, is as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any vessel engaged in the transportation of goods or persons from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists, to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof; and any such vessel which shall enter, or attempt to enter, a port of the United States, in violation thereof, shall forfeit to the United States a sum, to be awarded in the discretion of the court, not exceeding $5,000, which shall be a lien upon said vessel, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States. And in all such proceedings the United States district attorney for such district shall appear on behalf of the United States, and all such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the rules and laws governing cases of seizure of vessels for violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. All such vessels shall be required to obtain from the consul, vice-consul, or other consular officer of the United States at the port of departure, or from the medical officer, where such officer has been detailed by the President for that purpose, a certificate in duplicate setting forth the sanitary history of said vessel, and that it has in all respects complied with the rules and regulations in such cases prescribed for securing the best sanitary condition of the said vessel, its cargo, passengers, and crew; and said consular or medical officer is required, before granting such certificate, to be satisfied the matters and things therein stated are true; and for his services in that behalf he shall be entitled to demand and receive such fees as shall by lawful regulation be allowed, to be accounted for as is required in other cases.

That upon the request of the National Board of Health the President is authorized to detail a medical officer to serve in the office of the consul at any foreign port for the purpose of making the inspection and giving the certificates hereinbefore mentioned: Provided, That the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed at any one time six: Provided further, That any vessel sailing from any such port without such certificate of said medical officer, entering any port of the United States, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500, which shall be a lien on the same, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States. And in all such proceedings the United States district attorney for such district shall appear on behalf of the United States, and all such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the rules and laws governing cases of seizure of vessels for violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the National Board of Health shall co-operate with and, so far as it lawfully may, aid State and municipal boards of health and sanitary associations in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations of such boards and associations to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, and into one State from another.

And at such ports and places within the United States as have no quarantine regulations under State authority, where such regulations are, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, necessary to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, and at such ports and places within the United States where quarantine regulations exist under the authority of the State, which, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, are not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States, or into one State from another, the National Board of Health shall report the facts to the President of the United States, who shall, if, in his judgment, it is necessary and proper, order said Board of Health to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, which, when so made and approved by the President, shall be promulgated by the National Board of Health and enforced by the sanitary authorities of the States, where the State authorities will undertake to execute and enforce them; but if the State authorities shall fail or refuse to enforce said rules and regulations, the President may detail an officer or appoint a proper person for that purpose.

The Board of Health shall make such rules and regulations as are authorized by the laws of the United States and necessary to be observed by vessels at the port of departure and on the voyage where such vessels sail from any foreign port or place at which contagious or infectious disease exists, to any port or place in the United States, to secure the best sanitary condition of such vessel, her cargo, passengers, and crew, and when said rules and regulations have been approved by the President they shall be published and communicated to, and enforced by, the consular officers of the United States.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the National Board of Health to obtain information of the sanitary condition of foreign ports and places from which contagious and infectious diseases are or may be imported into the United States, and to this end the consular officers of the United States at such ports and places as shall be designated by the National Board of Health shall make to said Board of Health weekly reports of the sanitary condition of the ports and places at which they are respectively stationed, according to such forms as said Board of Health may prescribe; and the Board of Health shall also obtain, through all sources accessible, including State and municipal sanitary authorities throughout the United States, weekly reports of the sanitary condition of ports and places within the United States; and shall prepare, publish, and transmit to the medical officers of the Marine Hospital Service, to collectors of customs, and to State and municipal health officers and authorities, weekly abstracts of the consular sanitary reports and other pertinent information received by said board; and shall also, as far as it may be able, by means of the voluntary co-operation of State and municipal authorities, of public associations and private persons, procure information relating to the climatic and other conditions affecting the public health; and shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury an annual report of its operations, for transmission to Congress, with such recommendations as it may deem important to the public interests; and said report, if ordered to be printed by Congress, shall be done under the direction of the board.

SEC. 5. That the National Board of Health shall from time to time issue to the consular officers of the United States and to the medical officers serving at any foreign port, and otherwise make publicly known, the rules and regulations made by it and approved by the President, to be used and complied with by vessels in foreign ports for securing the best sanitary condition of such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, and crews, before their departure for any port in the United States, and in the course of the voyage; and all such other rules and regulations as shall be observed in the inspection of the same on the arrival thereof at any quarantine station at the port of destination, and for the disinfection and isolation of the same, and the treatment of cargo and persons on board, so as to prevent the introduction of cholera, yellow fever, or other contagious or infectious diseases; and it shall not be lawful for any vessel to enter said port to discharge its cargo or land its passengers except upon a certificate of the health officer at such quarantine station, certifying that said rules and regulations have in all respects been observed and complied with, as well on his part as on the part of the said vessel and its master, in respect to the same and to its cargo, passengers, and crew; and the master of every such vessel shall produce and deliver to the collector of customs at said port of entry, together with the other papers of the vessel, the said certificates required to be obtained at the port of departure, and the certificate herein required to be obtained from the health officer at the port of entry.

SEC. 6. That to pay the necessary expenses of placing vessels in proper sanitary condition, to be incurred under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to make the necessary rules and regulations fixing the amount of fees to be paid by vessels for such service, and the manner of collecting the same.

SEC. 7. That the President is authorized, when requested by the National Board of Health, and when the same can be done without prejudice to the public service, to detail officers from the several Departments of the Government for temporary duty, to act under the direction of said board, to carry out the provisions of this act; and such officers shall receive no additional compensation except for actual and necessary expenses incurred in the performance of such duties.

SEC. 8. That to meet the expenses to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be disbursed under the direction of the National Board of Health, which shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury a full and accurate report of its operations under this act and of all expenditures connected therewith, to be by him reported to Congress.

SEC. 9. That so much of the act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved April 29, 1878, as requires consular officers or other representatives of the United States at foreign ports to report the sanitary condition of and the departure of vessels from such ports to the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service; and so much of said act as requires the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service to frame rules and regulations and to execute said act, and to give notice to Federal and State officers of the approach of infected vessels, and furnish said officers with weekly abstracts of consular sanitary reports, and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HARRIS. These are all the amendments I am inclined to suggest, and now I propose to state briefly that in deference to what appeared to be the judgment of a majority of the Senate when this bill was under consideration some weeks ago——

Mr. HOAR. I desire, at some convenient time, to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to one very serious question of principle which seems to be involved in this bill. I do not know whether it would be more convenient to him to allow me to put my question now, that he may make the answer to it as a part of his speech if he sees fit, or to have me put it after he gets through.

Mr. HARRIS. It will be quite as convenient now as at any time.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the first section of this bill provides that any vessel which shall enter or attempt to enter a port of the United States in violation of any present or future regulation of a State board of health, shall incur a penalty which is to be enforced by criminal or penal process in the United States courts; so that when this bill becomes a law every regulation made by a State board of health is to be enforced, if the bill goes into full effect, by the courts of the United States, and their process. On the other hand, in section 3 there is a contrary provision that the laws and regulations made by the National Board of Health shall be promulgated and enforced by the sanitary authorities of the States where the State authorities will undertake to execute and enforce them.

Now, the question that I wish to put is a two-fold one: as to the constitutional power, and as to the sound public policy. Does the Senator think it is constitutional to enact that any vessel, whether owned by an American citizen or a foreigner, violating any State local arrangement, shall be punishable by a process to be enforced by the courts of the United States; in other words, delegating to that extent to the States the power to make laws as United States laws which the United States undertakes and is bound to execute? On the other hand, if it were constitutional, what does the Senator say to the sound policy of such a provision?

Mr. HARRIS. I was in the act of stating when interrupted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that, in deference to what the committee believed to be the judgment of a majority of the Senate, as indicated by the amendments proposed and the line of argument adopted when this bill was under consideration two or three weeks since, the committee has materially modified the bill, not in accordance with its own judgment, because the bill for which this is a substitute is very much more satisfactory to and in accordance with the views of the committee than the substitute now under consideration, though the committee believe that this bill, if it shall be enacted, will accomplish the main object intended by the original, not so directly, not perhaps altogether so certainly, because of the very question now raised by the Senator from Massachusetts. Instead of exercising the power delegated to Congress to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," and so regulating it as to strip it of contagious diseases, the evil of which I complain, in deference to what I understood to be the sentiment of a majority of the Senate, the present bill recognizes such regulations as State and municipal boards of health throughout the country may have adopted for that purpose, and makes it the duty of the National Board of Health to co-operate with and aid those associations in the enforcement of their rules and regulations so far as their rules and regulations tend to prevent the importation of contagious diseases from abroad or from one State into another.

The bill does provide, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, in its first section that all vessels sailing from foreign ports where contagious diseases exist to any port in the United States in violation of the provisions of this bill shall incur such penalties as the court may in its discretion impose, not to exceed $5,000. In the opinion of the committee it would have been better for the authority of the United States to have made its own rules and regulations, and through its own agencies to have enforced them; but, as I said before, the committee felt bound to respect what seemed to be the judgment of a majority of the Senate, as shown by its vote and by the amendments offered and the arguments made upon the occasion referred to, and therefore by this bill the quarantine regulations of every State are not only recognized but it is made the duty of the National Board of Health to aid in their enforcement so far as they tend to prevent the importation of contagion from foreign countries or from one State into another.

I do not think there is any difficulty upon the constitutional view of the question. Where the Federal Government has not exercised the power and the States have exercised it and have formed for themselves quarantine regulations which prevent the introduction of contagious diseases into the United States or into one State from another, Congress having failed to exercise its power, there can be, in my opinion, no doubt as to the power of the States to exercise such powers.

Mr. HOAR. That was not the precise point. As I understand, a violation of a State regulation of health, made by a State board of health, is by this proposed statute made an offense against the United States, indictable and punishable in the courts of the United States. Let me make an illustration. It is well settled, I suppose, that the States may pass laws punishing the counterfeiting of the coin or notes of the United States, or the passing thereof, by one citizen of a State upon another. Would it be constitutional for us to enact that any person who should counterfeit United States notes or pass counterfeit notes, in violation of any State law, should be indictable and punishable in the courts of the United States? That is my question.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to interpose at this point? The bill provides that any violation of such State regulations as now exist or as may at any time hereafter be imposed, shall entail a penalty which may be $5,000 in money "which shall be a lien upon said vessel to be recovered by proceedings," &c. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether his notice has fallen on the point that this provision would change rights of stockholders in companies who own vessels. Here is to be inflicted not upon the person who violates a State regulation, but upon the property itself, a very large sum, to be recovered in a qui tam action it might be, because I observe that the subsequent lines of the bill say it is to be done as recoveries may now be had. It would give therefore a qui tam action to such persons as might give information, which action is virtually an action in rem, taking the property of innocent persons, and that under national authority because of an infraction by somebody else of a State regulation not existent when the rights of the parties became vested, not existing now at the time of the legislation, but to come into being at any time afterward under the encouragement of this legislation. If it be agreeable to the honorable Senator, in the exposition of the bill I desire very much to hear him consider that point in connection with the others.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in regard to the questions both of the Senator from Massachusetts and of the Senator from New York, I will say that the first and second sections of this bill have been very slightly modified to conform to the modifications made in the third section, in which is to be found the chief modification of the principles of the bill. I confess that my attention has not been particularly directed to the remedy for violations of the provisions of the bill as it now stands modified by the third section.

The bill for which this is a substitute provided for the making of all necessary rules and regulations by the National Board of Health under the authority of the Government of the United States, and for their enforcement by that authority. The principle of the bill is changed by this substitute to the extent of recognizing and aiding in the enforcement of such rules and regulations of State boards as tend to prevent the introduction of contagion from foreign countries or from one State into another, leaving the first and second sections with their penalties and the remedies that they provided for under the former draught of the bill that looked only to the exercise of Federal power in the formation and enforcement of rules and regulations.

I am not prepared to assert that the provisions referred to are entirely free from difficulties in applying the remedies prescribed by the first and second sections of the bill in case of violations. I shall be very ready to hear from the honorable Senator from New York or the honorable Senator from Massachusetts any suggestion practical in its character as to the proper remedy if these provisions do not furnish it; a remedy which in the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts shall be constitutional and legitimate, and if unnecessary hardships and evils are to be inflicted by the provisions of these sections, as suggested by the honorable Senator from New York, I shall be glad to hear suggestions from him as to the proper remedy in case of violations, and shall be quite ready to adopt any such suggestion which does not destroy the principle and efficacy of the bill.

To proceed with the explanation of the changes made in the bill, the third section provides:

> That the National Board of Health shall co-operate with and, so far as it lawfully may, aid State and municipal boards of health and sanitary associations in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations of such boards and associations.

It further provides that at such ports and places within the United States as have no regulations for the prevention of the introduction of contagious diseases, where in the opinion of the National Board of Health such regulations are necessary, and at such ports and places within the United States as have regulations of this character which in the opinion of the National Board of Health are not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases from foreign countries or from one State into another, in each of these cases the Board of Health shall report the facts to the President of the United States, and if in his judgment quarantine regulations are necessary in the first case, and existing quarantine regulations are insufficient in the second, and more effective regulations are necessary, he is required to order the Board of Health to make such rules and regulations in each case as are necessary, and when so made and approved by the President they are to be promulgated by the National Board of Health and enforced by the State authorities if the State authorities will undertake to execute and enforce them; but where the State authorities shall fail or refuse to execute and enforce them, then it becomes the duty of the President to either detail an officer or appoint a suitable person for that purpose so that they shall be enforced.

These are the principal changes which are made in the bill. I understood the chief objection urged by the Senators from Massachusetts and from New York to the bill for which this is a substitute was that the former bill would conflict with and displace the quarantine and sanitary regulations of the various States; that it would be dangerous to so displace and uproot them for an untried system, the rules and regulations of which were yet to be made—regulations which were not before the Senate so that we could judge of their necessity and propriety; therefore they could not afford to change rules and regulations now existing, which in some localities I grant are quite perfect, for a system that was not before them and of the merits of which they could not judge.

Now, I confess that I am somewhat surprised to find that the objection comes from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that we have gone too far in the direction of recognizing and respecting the rules and regulations of State boards and State sanitary authorities. I had hoped that by this modification, which deferred to and proposed to aid in the execution of those regulations where they existed in the States, the bill would be entirely satisfactory to that class of objectors. Under the provisions of this bill the committee believe that the main object and purpose which the committee had in view will be accomplished, not so speedily, not so certainly perhaps, but still will be accomplished and accomplished at every point in the United States where such regulations are necessary to be observed for the prevention of the importation of contagion from foreign countries into the United States or into one State from another.

The other sections of the bill that I have not referred to stand very much as they did in the original, being modified only so far as was necessary to conform to the changes made in the third section. The appropriation that the original bill provided for of $650,000 is reduced in this bill to $500,000, because of the fact that the original bill required the National Board of Health to make such investigations as might be necessary as to diseases in cattle, and to report thereon. Being charged with that duty the National Board of Health thought it unsafe to ask for a less appropriation than $150,000 on that account, $500,000 being the estimate of the Board of Health independent of the investigation of and report upon the diseases of cattle. In the substitute we have stricken from the bill the two sections that required the Board of Health to investigate and report upon that question; and having stricken these sections from the bill, the appropriation has been reduced from $650,000 to $500,000.

I believe there are no other material changes made in any section of the bill. Some other sections have been stricken out because under the provisions of section three they were deemed wholly unnecessary.

This, I believe, is the only explanation that I care to take up the time of the Senate to make.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the prohibitory and punitive provisions of this bill, so far as I can ascertain from a somewhat cursory reading, appear to become immediately operative, so that any vessel which should enter a port of the United States from foreign ports in violation of the provisions of this act, in case it should become a law, would be immediately subject to prosecution and to the imposition of a fine in case it should be shown to have been guilty of violating the provisions. Now, I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether there should not be some period after the passage of this bill, in case it should become a law, within which the information of its terms should become disseminated and promulgated. Of course it is understood that ignorance of the law does not excuse any one; but it would be obviously unjust to pass a bill imposing such restrictions as these upon foreign commerce and make it immediately operative, so that before any time had been allowed for the promulgation of its provisions and penalties vessels from foreign ports entering ports of the United States should become immediately subject to the imposition of heavy fines for the violation of rules of which they could not by any possibility have notice, being, it might be, upon the high seas, where information could not reach them even by telegraph, much less by the promulgation of the necessary rules and regulations through the consular authorities at the different ports from which they might sail. I would suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that there should be some period prescribed by the bill within which its terms would become operative, say a period of thirty or sixty days after its approval, or at least a provision that the penalties should not be imposed until proof was afforded that the regulations had been promulgated officially in the ports from which the vessels might sail.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will prepare an amendment upon his latter suggestion I see no objection to it; that is, requiring proof of the fact that the regulations had been promulgated in the port from which the vessel sailed. I see no objection to that.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator understands that I have nothing but the most friendly sentiments toward his bill, and I wish to offer no amendment that would not be agreeable to him. I merely make the suggestion as it occurred to me from a very hasty reading of the bill that a provision obviously just had been omitted; and perhaps of the two methods that might be pursued, the better one would be to say that these vessels should not be subject to the penalties imposed by the section unless there was proof that the regulations and rules had been duly promulgated by the officers at the ports from which they had departed.

Mr. CALL. The bill now before the Senate, Mr. President, is one in which the people of my State have very great interest. The sea-coast of Florida, I believe, is very little less than fifteen hundred miles in extent. The island of Cuba, where the yellow fever, which is the great pest and enemy of the Southern States, originates, and which threatens every year to come further and further northward, is almost in sight of the extreme southern point of Florida. With a sea-coast of fifteen hundred miles in length, and the limited means and small population of the State, it is almost impossible for the means derived from the State revenues to guard the coast and furnish the necessary protection against the introduction of disease from abroad, if there be any disease brought in by importation. We have, therefore, a very great interest in having some law on this subject; and the United States and the people of the United States have quite as great an interest as we in having the points of contact in Florida properly guarded against the introduction of the yellow fever.

I find in the Constitution and the rules established for its interpretation a very complete answer to the objections which have been made to the adoption by Congress for the United States of the regulations of the health boards and the quarantine laws of the different States upon this subject. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries upon the Constitution, in the four hundred and forty-seventh section, on page 431, says:

(1.) Wherever the power given to the General Government requires that, to be efficacious and adequate to its end, it should be exclusive there arises a just implication for deeming it exclusive. Whether exercised or not in such a case makes no difference. (2.) Whenever the power in its own nature is not incompatible with a concurrent power in the States, either in its nature or exercise, there the power belongs to the States. (3.) But in such a case the concurrency of the power may admit of restrictions or qualifications in its nature or exercise. In its nature, when it is capable from its general character of being applied to objects or purposes which would control, defeat, or destroy the powers of the General Government. In its exercise, when there arises a conflict in the actual laws and regulations made in pursuance of the power by the General and State governments. In the former case there is a qualification ingrafted upon the generality of the power excluding its application to such objects and purposes. In the latter, there is (at least generally) a qualification, not upon the power itself, but only upon its exercise, to the extent of the actual conflict in the operations of each.

He goes on to say:

In fact, it is obvious that the same means may often be applied to carry into operation different powers. And a State may use the same means to effectuate an acknowledged power in itself which Congress may apply for another purpose in the acknowledged exercise of a very different power. Congress may make that a regulation of commerce which a State may employ as a guard for its internal policy, or to preserve the public health or peace, or to promote its own peculiar interests. These rules seem clearly deducible from the nature of the instrument; and they are confirmed by the positive injunctions of the tenth amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. Justice Story has found, then, in the construction of the Constitution in the cases which have been alluded to during the discussion of the former bill, especially the case of Gibbon vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton, the very authority which is exercised by the bill now before the Senate, the authority which the bill undertakes to enact, of adopting and enforcing by act of Congress the quarantine laws and the health regulations of the different States.

So far as the objection made by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is concerned there may be some force in the suggestion as to the expediency of imposing a lien upon the property of foreign shareholders or domestic shareholders in vessels which may by improper conduct of their masters be subjected to the law. I think there is no doubt, however, as to the authority of Congress and as to the customary course of law in imposing a lien of that kind on a vessel engaged in commerce. I believe the whole remedy which is within the power of the United States, or of any other government, of regulating the entry of vessels engaged in commerce on the high seas into the ports of the country is enforced by lien upon the vessel. There is no other system that is practicable. It might, perhaps, be expedient, possibly wise, in this case—I do not undertake to say that it would be—to make this a personal penalty rather than one attached to the property of the vessel. However, I am anxious, and the interests of my people demand, that some such law as this shall be passed. I think it would be far more efficacious, as I have suggested to the honorable chairman who has the bill in charge, if provision were made for compensation to the local officers who may be appointed under the authority of this act to carry into effect its provisions or the State regulations. I am sure that with the immense seaboard of my own State, and the comparatively small revenue of the State and its small population, and the large expenditure necessary to guard so extensive a coast, it would be advisable that there should be some specific provision of the bill providing for compensation to those who may be employed to carry its provisions into effect.

I hope that the bill will receive the favorable consideration of the Senate and that it will pass, and that amendments may be made in the respect I have indicated looking to the immense seaboard of my State and the other States South which need to be protected, as we have understood. We have a great deal of experience in my own State, at least in its southernmost extremity, for while the yellow fever has scarcely ever made its appearance, with but one or two exceptions, upon the part of the coast of Florida above Key West, it has almost every year been imported into Key West and extended from there for some short distance up and down the mainland. We have found—it is the experience of a century under the Spanish occupation of that country and since—that an efficient quarantine is an effective guard against the introduction of the fever. We have found in cases where, as two years ago, the yellow fever made its appearance in the Southern States and at some places was exceedingly fatal, that in the town in which I live, separated only twenty-five or thirty miles from the town of Fernandina, an efficient system of quarantine prevented the introduction of fever at all into the town of Jacksonville, while it raged with terrible fatality in the town of Fernandina.

That is in keeping with the experience of our people, and we have had some further and very remarkable instances. As the subject was under discussion here some time ago, I will mention a single fact that is well known to the medical profession in my own town and which has received universal credence there. Some twenty years ago the yellow fever made its appearance in Jacksonville and Saint Augustine, the only time when it has ever been known to appear there to any great extent. Four years afterward, when the physicians were entirely familiar from their experience in that pestilence with the disease, two cases of yellow fever occurred in the town without any in the surrounding country, without any appearance of it upon the coast, without any in the United States elsewhere—two cases of clearly defined yellow fever. They were the only cases that appeared, and they both terminated fatally. Upon inquiry, the symptoms having all been perfectly marked and unmistakable, it was ascertained that a young man had come from Havana a short time before these attacks came on, and just as he had left Havana, on the day of leaving, he had gone with a friend to visit a sick friend in the yellow-fever ward of the hospital in Havana. He had come directly to his home in Jacksonville, and there, having some presents for some children, relatives of his, he had carried them into his room and opened his trunk; and the two children who were present when the articles of clothing were taken out were seized with the yellow fever within a very short period of time and died. That was the only instance, either before or after, for a term of some ten or twelve years of the appearance of yellow fever in any portion of that country. It has not been there since, with the exception of its appearance in the epidemic at Fernandina two years ago. This fact is regarded in our town and among our medical profession there as conclusive evidence that the yellow fever is imported in some way in the clothing and through the presence of those who have been in immediate contact with it.

I submit this for your consideration. I hope the bill will pass. I consider it to be one of great importance to our country and of very great importance to all the people of the United States. I think the coast of Florida should be effectually and carefully guarded in all points of contact between it and the island of Cuba.

Mr. INGALLS. In pursuance of the suggestion that I made before the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] addressed the Senate, I now offer an amendment, to come in at the close of section 4, after line 41, in the following words:

Provided, That none of the penalties herein imposed shall attach to any vessel, or any owner or officer thereof, till this act and the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof shall have been officially promulgated for at least ten days in the port from which said vessel sailed.

The interim of ten days or some period appears to be necessary from the fact that an inspection and a certificate are necessary before the vessel can depart. I propose this at the end of section 4, inasmuch as the three preceding sections all refer to the rules and regulations and the penalties to be imposed for violation thereof.

Mr. PADDOCK. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. HARRIS. It should be at the close of section 3 instead of section 4.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is correct; it should be at the close of section 3.

Mr. HARRIS. I see no objection to the amendment, and hope it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BAILEY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the amendment just adopted, if the bill stands, will make the law inoperative as a penal law unless every regulation of a State board of health in this country has been promulgated in the port from which the vessel sails. Of course, if the chairman of the committee does not object to that it is not for me to object. I now move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out all down to and including the word "thereof," in the ninth line, and substituting what I send to the Chair. If this be adopted it will require some further amendment later in the bill to conform to the general purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed to be inserted will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That whenever, in the opinion of the President of the United States, there is danger that cholera or yellow fever may be introduced from abroad into any port or place within the United States, or spread from State to State within the same, and in his judgment the existing quarantine or health regulations at such exposed places are insufficient, he may authorize the Board of Health to make further rules and regulations in the premises; which, being submitted to and approved by him, shall be valid and in force.

Mr. HARRIS. Where does the Senator propose to insert that amendment?

Mr. HOAR. I propose to strike out all down to the word "thereof," in the ninth line of the first section, and insert what has been read.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think there is any necessity for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and it will defeat that degree of promptitude of action which, in my judgment, is absolutely necessary. If these rules and regulations are not to be enforced except when the President shall be satisfied of the existence of disease, in all probability their enforcement would come too late to prevent its introduction or spread. The adoption of the amendment is the practical defeat of the purpose and policy of the bill. And as to the apprehension of the Senator from Massachusetts with regard to the enforcement of these quarantine laws of the States, I find that the act of last year, while it does not in terms impose penalties to be enforced in the courts of the United States for a violation of the act, does make it unlawful for any vessel engaged in the commerce of this country to enter any port of the United States contrary to the quarantine laws of such State. The same provisions are found in the act of 1799 and in every act of Congress upon the subject.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator read the act of last year, or so much of it as he refers to?

Mr. HARRIS. The act of 1878 and the act of 1799 declare that it is unlawful for any vessel engaged in the commerce of the country to enter any port in violation of the quarantine laws of the State. The act of 1878 I will read the first section of:

That no vessel or vehicle coming from any foreign port or country where any contagious or infectious disease may exist, and no vessel or vehicle conveying any person or persons, merchandise or animals, affected with any infectious or contagious disease, shall enter any port of the United States or pass the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, contrary to the quarantine laws of any one of said United States, into or through the jurisdiction of which said vessel or vehicle may pass, or to which it is destined, or except in the manner and subject to the regulations to be prescribed as hereinafter provided.

It makes it unlawful, as does the act of 1799, for any vessel to enter any port except in conformity to the quarantine regulations of the State. This act does no more except that after declaring it unlawful it distinctly provides the remedy and the jurisdiction in which that remedy is to be enforced. So if this bill be an error I think the act of 1799 and the act of 1878 are equally erroneous in that respect. We have the precedents at least of all the legislation Congress has ever adopted upon the subject, this bill following exactly in the line of the precedents in that respect.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the chief distinction between the amendment which I have proposed and the bill of the committee is that the amendment points out the two distinct and positive dangers, to wit, cholera and yellow fever, and does not put in this Board of Health a general superintendence over the commerce of the world whenever it grows out of trade with any port where any infectious disease whatever exists. That, of course, includes substantially the whole world; and a board disposed to extend and amplify their jurisdiction will extend it to the commerce of the whole world and to the internal commerce between the States, because there is no prevalent disease, however comparatively innocuous it may be, which may not be said to be contagious to some extent.

It seems to me that the Senators who desire this legislation get all the protection that they or their section require by aiming at the two principal dangers, to wit, yellow fever and cholera, and that the provision that the Board of Health may make additional rules and regulations to be submitted to the President, with machinery to be added later in the bill for penal proceedings for a violation of this, is all that the present necessity requires.

Mr. HARRIS. I think the restriction to the two diseases named by the Senator from Massachusetts is quite as objectionable as the inevitable delay which his amendment will produce. That it produces delay in the enforcement of necessary rules and regulations is certain, and that delay, I fear, would be fatal; but why confine these regulations to two diseases named? Is it not just as important—the danger perhaps is not so imminent, but is it not equally important to quarantine against the plague, small-pox, and that class of diseases, as yellow fever and cholera? The danger to be apprehended from yellow fever is more threatening at this time than that from any other disease; but is it not equally important, when providing for security against epidemic and contagious diseases, that we provide against these other diseases quite as fatal, quite as dangerous as the two diseases named? I see no necessity for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and hope that it may not be adopted.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee for his understanding or that of the committee in respect of the number of disorders embraced or which may be embraced by the term "contagious or infectious diseases?"

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator desire an answer now?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. HARRIS. I find in a report of a sanitary congress that assembled in Paris some years ago, which I believe is recognized among sanitarians as authority, that the diseases of plague, cholera, yellow fever, small-pox, and typhoid fever are the only diseases known to the profession that it is deemed necessary and proper to quarantine against; but these are all specified, if my memory is not at fault, as diseases that it is proper to quarantine against. They are the only ones that I am prepared to specify, and while to limit the operation of the quarantine rules and regulations to yellow fever, cholera, small-pox, and plague may answer all practical purposes, I think it better to leave the bill as it is without such limitation.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Tennessee anticipates, by agreeing with me, the suggestion I was about to make. He has named but five diseases to be quarantined against—fevers, two kinds, yellow and typhoid; small-pox; plague; and cholera. Those are five well-known diseases, each described by a simple popular name. If he means no others, it seems to me it would be well to recite, as the recitation is so short, the diseases he does mean. As I understand—and I speak of course with diffidence by the aid of that imperfect information touching such topics common among men—a great variety of diseases for aught that we know and for aught that medical science has ever established, may be truly and would be inevitably classified as "contagious or infectious diseases." In respect of many of the most common maladies to which flesh is heir, it is I believe to this day a moot question among the physiologists and pathologists of all countries whether they be indeed infectious or contagious or not, whether they can be communicated by contact or communicated by the air which receives its quality from the presence of a person diseased. So the language of the bill as it stands now would violate that instruction which comes to us from one of the maxims of the law so familiar to the Senator from Tennessee, which declares that that is certain which can be rendered certain. I see no way in which we or those who administer the law could ever render certain the inquiry whether by infectious or contagious disorders we intended to embrace more or less. Of course, it would be clear that many diseases admitted to be infectious and contagious were embraced, but as to the others, uncertainty must remain.

Mr. KERNAN. On this point I will read a section of the New York statute defining what are infectious or contagious, and it will be seen that there is considerable discretion left to the officers. In the statute as to quarantine regulation in New York it is provided:

The only diseases against which quarantine shall apply are yellow fever, cholera, typhus or ship-fever, and small-pox, and any new disease not now known of a contagious, infectious, or pestilential nature, at the discretion of the quarantine commissioners and health officer.

Mr. HARRIS. I think we may very safely leave this matter as it stands in the bill to the sound judgment and discretion of the National Board of Health with the approval of the President. The diseases that I deem it absolutely necessary, however, to provide against are those named, and I shall not seriously object to inserting the restriction suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] confining the operation of these rules and regulations to those four diseases; but that would involve the necessity of changing almost every section of the bill, or various sections at any rate; and I deem it quite unnecessary to incorporate the restriction in the bill, though I do not regard it as a matter of serious consequence.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make one or two inquiries of the Senator. I confess that I have not given this bill a critical examination so as to understand it entirely; but I desire to know what there is in the act of April 29, 1878, which is repealed by the last section of this act that is not in itself sufficient to carry out all that is necessary in reference to ascertaining that which is desired pertaining to the diseases mentioned in this bill. By the act of April 29, 1878, it is provided:

That whenever any infectious or contagious disease shall appear in any foreign port or country, and whenever any vessel shall leave any infected foreign port, or, having on board goods or passengers coming from any place or district infected with cholera or yellow fever, shall leave any foreign port, bound for any port in the United States, the consular officer, or other representative of the United States at or nearest such foreign port, shall immediately give information thereof to the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service, and shall report to him the name, the date of departure, and the port of destination of such vessel; and shall also make the same report to the health officer of the port of destination in the United States, and the consular officers of the United States shall make weekly reports to him of the sanitary condition of the ports at which they are respectively stationed: and the said Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be charged with the execution of the provisions of this act, and shall frame all needful rules and regulations for that purpose, which rules and regulations shall be subject to the approval of the President, but such rules and regulations shall not conflict with or impair any sanitary or quarantine laws or regulations of any State or municipal authorities now existing or which may hereafter be enacted.

Taking that section with the additional act that was passed authorizing the organization of the National Board of Health in connection with this Marine Hospital Service to act together, what is there wanting in this section requiring and authorizing the information to be obtained that is better provided for in this bill that is now before us? I should like to know what it is. Except some change of officers, of organization, is there anything in addition to this that is necessary except merely providing that other diseases may be included that are not included in section 2 of the act of 1878?

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the third section of the bill under consideration authorizes the making of rules and regulations and their enforcement at all points in the United States where in the opinion of the National Board of Health and the President they may be necessary to prevent the importation of disease into the country or from one State to another.

The act of 1878 gives no such authority, but only provides for the enforcement of such rules and regulations as exist or may hereafter exist in the several States; and the Senator is aware of the fact that more than half the States in the Union have no quarantine regulations at all. Therefore it is very important that the power should be lodged somewhere to make and enforce regulations where they do not exist, and where regulations exist which are not sufficient for the accomplishment of the object it is important that the power should be given to some tribunal to make such rules and regulations as will be sufficient to accomplish the object.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the object in reference to this section, and that causes me to make a further inquiry. If the object be a mere enlargement of this particular section of the law of 1878 with a view of lodging the authority for the purpose of enforcing the act somewhere, the authority in the law of 1878 being lodged somewhere already, could not the same object be attained by an amendment to this section authorizing the enforcement by the authority in which the enforcement is already lodged? Could not the same thing be accomplished by including the States that the Senator mentions with those already included in this section of the act of 1878? Why create a new board? Why lodge the authority somewhere else than where it is now lodged in the law, unless the authority is not properly employed or unless it is improperly lodged in some one not competent or not proper to execute the law? Why, I ask, is this change necessitated? Why go further than a mere amendment of this section of the act of 1878 which would include a district or portions of our country not already included in the law and places outside of the ports of the United States?

Mr. HARRIS. That the object might be accomplished in the manner suggested by the honorable Senator I have no doubt; but if to be accomplished in that way he should introduce a bill to repeal the act creating the National Board of Health. At the last session of Congress a national board of health was created by act of Congress, and I think wisely created. In my judgment it is the best tribunal for the consideration of the questions submitted to it and the performance of the duties imposed upon it. The members of the board are selected with an eye single to their peculiar qualifications for the duties which the board is expected to perform. The board is confined to the performance of these specific duties, while the officers of the Marine Hospital Service have their various duties to perform. The duties imposed upon the Marine Hospital Service by the act of 1878 were in addition to the ordinary duties of that service. They are not so well qualified, in my judgment, however well qualified they may be, for the consideration and disposition of the various questions with which the National Board of Health must deal, as the Board of Health, selected, as it is, for the express purpose and because of the peculiar fitness of its members for the performance of the duties assigned to it.

For that reason I think the National Board of Health should be charged with the performance of this class of duties and the Marine Hospital Service relieved from the additional duties which the act of 1878 imposed upon it. It is not necessary for the Marine Hospital Service to receive weekly sanitary reports from the consular officers of the United States serving at foreign ports and to make and distribute weekly abstracts of such reports to all the boards of health, sanitary associations, and officers of the customs in the United States while the National Board of Health exists and is charged with precisely the same duty. Therefore, the last section of the bill proposes to repeal so much of the act of 1878 as imposes the duty upon the officers of the Marine Hospital Service.

Mr. LOGAN. I am making these inquiries for the purpose of being advised in regard to the bill. It does seem to me, however, without objecting to the Board of Health, for I make no objection to it, that at the time this Board of Health was provided for by the law of the last Congress the intention was to make it a kind of an advisory board in connection with the Marine Hospital Service. But this bill eliminates all power in the law heretofore belonging to the Marine Hospital Service, and transfers it to the newly organized board. They are made not only a board for the purpose of examining these questions, but they are made a board for the purpose of executing the law. Further than that, they are made a disbursing board for the purpose of disbursing the $500,000 appropriated in the bill.

The service has heretofore been performed under the act of 1878, and in fact under the laws prior to that; for we find a law on our statute-books as early, I believe, as 1799, providing for the execution of the quarantine laws, placing the authority in the hands of certain officers of the Government. If it is intended by this bill that there shall be a board of eminent physicians for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of certain diseases and ascertaining when those diseases originate and where, and giving notice and providing as well as possible against them, would it not be well that that board should be a board receiving their salaries for the purpose of giving this information, for the purpose of advising the proper officers of the Government, for the purpose of giving information to the Marine Hospital Service and the Army wherever it may be required or wherever it may be desired, and let the rules and regulations that may be established be enforced? By whom? By the officers who are duly and properly authorized to enforce the laws of the country.

I do not believe that all this power should at once be transferred to a new board, because it is a well-known fact, as history proves to us, that no bureau has ever been established in this country, that no officers of this kind have been organized, but what usually, instead of being wiped out or abolished as time rolls on, their jurisdiction is increased and enlarged instead of being diminished. So it will be with this board. Therefore, so far as I am individually concerned, without being opposed to the organization of the board, for I am not, I would rather not see the powers that are herein granted given to that board. I would rather see them made a board advisory to some Department of the Government for the purpose of ascertaining the things which are desirable to be ascertained and to have the laws enforced by other officers of the Government.

In the repealing clause of the bill that is before us everything is repealed that pertains to the duty of the Marine Hospital Service so far as that duty is applicable to this particular service. The duty of making reports, the duty of publishing bulletins, the duty of issuing instructions, of making rules and regulations, the duty of enforcing those rules and regulations, is all repealed by this proposed act and lodged elsewhere. If the rules and regulations that have been made are not sufficient, we ought to know it. If the rules and regulations that have been made are inadequate, that would be a good reason for having different rules made. If the rules and regulations have not been published as required, that might be a reason to show the incompetency of a certain officer. If the bulletins of health are incorrect, that might be a good reason; if they are not published promptly, that might be a good reason; if the facts to be ascertained have not been sought after properly, that would be a good reason for a change; but unless some of these causes do exist under the present law showing the incompetency or the want of time or some reason why the law has not been complied with by the authority upon whom the duty is placed under it, I do not see any reason for a transfer to some other board for the purpose of expending more money.

I have before me the bulletins of health published by the Department under the law already existing on our statute-book. No fault is found with them. No fault, as I understand, is found with the reports or the examinations that have been made. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that the very work that he now is attempting to take from the Marine Hospital Service was originated so far as this plan is concerned in that service and by the aid of that service. The very bills that were passed into laws originated in that service, and the service complete as it is, though wanting perhaps in some particulars, came from that bureau of this Government. The activity with which that bureau or division, or whatever it may be termed, has exhibited its energy for the last few years since its organization in developing this very system, ought at least to have some consideration at the hands of the Congress of the United States. But so soon as some great plan has been developed by the genius and knowledge and experience of some of the men connected with that bureau, then the whole subject is to be taken from their hands and placed in other hands, with a large amount of money, to be used properly no doubt—I do not say it will be improperly used—but certainly an amount of money that has never been thought of for this purpose before.

I do not know the fact to be as I state it, that it will not require this amount of money, but I have been told by persons in whom I have the greatest confidence, persons who have been connected with the development of this very system itself, that $50,000 would be ample for everything that is required in the ascertainment of all the facts necessary and in the execution of all the rules and laws that are necessary on this subject; and I believe it. Why is it that when this system was developed before by men of science and experience, they did not desire so large an appropriation as this for the purpose of preparing these rules, for the purpose of publishing these bulletins and notifying the world as to the condition of health in all countries, for the purpose of notifying consuls and receiving notice from consuls? For all these things provided for in the law, why is it that this amount was never required or asked for before? It was because no such amount was necessary. Five thousand dollars is all the money that has ever been asked, as I understand it, for the purpose of publishing everything necessary to notify the whole country as to the locality of certain diseases, as to the condition of health in all parts of this country. Of course that is only one part of this work; but when you take that part of the work it forms a great deal of it. Five thousand dollars is all, at least as I understand it, that it was thought would be required under the system provided for in 1878 for the publication and preparation of all of the things necessary to advise the whole country.

Then for what purpose is an appropriation of $500,000 now proposed? What use is to be made of it? I should like the Senator to explain; at least I should like to know. I cannot see for what purpose this $500,000 is to be used. We all know that if we appropriate $5,000,000 for any bureau of the Government or any Department of the Government some way will be found to expend the last dollar. If it is even by hiring extra sweepers or something extra the last dollar must be expended. There are but few exceptions to this general rule so far as appropriations are concerned.

I say, then, that so far as this bill is concerned in its general features I do not see the necessity for it. I can see the necessity for having boards of health, and I agree to that. I would prefer this to be an advisory board, however; one to advise the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Marine Hospital Service, the Medical Department of the Army and of the Navy if necessary, and then to have a law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to enforce the regulations or rules that might be laid down and agreed upon. Thus you would require no expenditure of money except to pay these men their salaries. Let them provide the rules if they desire; but let the Secretary of the Treasury enforce them, and then let the general appropriations for the purpose of enforcing laws apply to this law as well as to the enforcement of all other laws. Then you will not put the power in the hands of a few men to distribute, disburse, and expend money when it is unnecessary.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon the question of expenditure I have only to say that in the event of an epidemic such as we had last year the sum of $500,000 is perhaps too small an amount, certainly as small as it would be safe for Congress to appropriate to the objects and purposes of this bill. If there is no epidemic then I can assure the Senator from Illinois that the $500,000 will not be expended. Why should this Board of Health expend more money in the performance of its duties than the officers of the Marine Hospital Service would expend, if the Board of Health is composed of competent and honest men, as it certainly is?

Mr. LOGAN. I have no question of that whatever.

Mr. HARRIS. I cannot see how it is possible for their expenditures to be greater than would be expended by the officers of the Marine Hospital Service in the performance of the same duties, with the single exception of the small pay allowed seven members of the board.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to call his attention to one fact. He speaks of the honesty of these men. Of course I have nothing to say about it; doubtless they are all honorable gentlemen. There is no doubt of that. Some of them I know myself, and I speak of them as gentlemen and men whom I believe to be honest. The presumption is that all officers are honest. Does the Senator not know that in the Post-Office Department, in the War Department, in the Treasury Department, in the State Department, and in every Department of this Government, the appropriations are expended, and generally a deficit occurs in most of them? Why? Because wherever you appropriate a large sum of money, the idea is not that they must economize, but if they have a portion of it left they will say, "I have so much of an unexpended balance, and why should I not provide for this thing?" That is the rule, and we all know it. It is not a question of honesty, because if you appropriate the money these men will expend it; it is not dishonest, so that they do not expend it improperly for their own purposes. If they expend what they think is right, it is not dishonest, but there is always some way found that brings about a necessity for the expenditure of whatever appropriations may be made by Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. While it is true that the appropriations made to any Department of the Government are usually expended, and sometimes there is a deficit, the Senator from Illinois very well knows that the appropriations to the various Departments of the Government are based upon estimates, which estimates are drawn from the absolute experience of the Department for long years in the past and the experience of the last fiscal year; and the appropriations are not only confined to those estimates, but their estimates, as the Senator very well knows, are not infrequently cut down by the two Houses of Congress. It is not so in this case. This appropriation is not upon an estimate based upon experience. It is necessarily speculative to some extent in its character. It is impossible to foresee the extent of the necessity; but of one thing I am confident: in the event of an epidemic every dollar of the $500,000 will be absolutely necessary. In the event there is no epidemic, then I am equally confident that no such sum as $500,000 will be necessary or will be expended by the Board of Health.

As to another suggestion of the Senator from Illinois when last up, the fact that the act of 1878 was drafted by the surgeon-general of the Marine Hospital Service and the whole plan was conceived by him, and the act passed partly if not wholly at his suggestion—I grant all that, not knowing whether it be true or not, but I take for granted that it is true as the Senator states it—allow me to state to the honorable Senator that I chance to know that a bill which I had the honor to report to the Senate at the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress, which transferred all of these duties and powers from the officers of the Marine Hospital Service to a national board of health, just as this bill does, met the full approval and had the warmest support of the late surgeon-general of the Marine Hospital Service, Dr. Woodworth. That fact I chance personally to know; and so far as the opinions of that gentleman are to be weighed in determining the propriety of continuing these powers and these duties with the Marine Hospital Service, his later convictions were that the National Board of Health was the proper tribunal to exercise them.

Mr. LOGAN. As far as that is concerned, I did not call the attention of the Senate to that fact to show the necessity of retaining the power with the Marine Hospital Service at all, but merely to show from whence this whole plan emanated. No matter what the desire of any individual might be to rid himself of labor, that is not the point. Dr. Woodworth is dead and gone. He is a man for whom I have the kindest remembrance, and for whom I had the greatest regard during his life-time, and whom I had known well and long. The question is not whether Dr. Woodworth or Dr. Hamilton or any other head of the Marine Hospital Service might desire to get rid of labor, but whether the power residing there is well placed or not. I suppose that any of us would be glad to get rid of labor. The point with me was only to show that there was no necessity for extending the jurisdiction and power of this board until it was tested. Let the bill be so amended that the power of executing the law shall remain where that power now resides, and let this board be an advisory board for the purpose of getting up rules, or aiding and assisting in getting up rules, whatever may be necessary, in conjunction with these other men; and when rules are gotten up satisfactory to them and the medical department of the Government, then leave the execution of the rules under the law with the executive authority of the Government, and let the expenditures in reference to it be like other appropriations to be expended by the Department. That is the point, and there can be no objection to that in my judgment. To my mind there ought to be no objection to such a provision, either on the part of this Board of Health or anybody else, because they have all the power necessary for an examination into contagious diseases, from whence they emanate, and the preparation of the rules necessary to regulate vessels of any kind, or cars, or whatever may be included in this bill. That power would still exist so far as making rules and regulations; but as to the expenditure of money and the execution of the law, let that rest where it now rests in reference to other laws of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] which the Secretary will again report.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman having the bill in charge shall consent, as he has suggested he will, to amend the first section of the bill by enumerating distinct diseases——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator perhaps misunderstood me. I said I would be glad to have him suggest such amendment as in his judgment was necessary. When I see the amendment, I will say whether I consent to it or not.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator did not exercise his usual wisdom in waiting to hear the statement I was about to make before he answered it, which he almost always does.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg pardon of the Senator for having interposed.

Mr. HOAR. I repeat what I was saying. I said if the Senator would consent to amend the first section of the bill as he said he would, by enumerating the five or six specific diseases aimed at instead of letting the bill extend to everything which the Board of Health may fancy to be a contagious disease, I would withdraw my amendment for the present. Am I mistaken in understanding the Senator to say that he had no objection to that?

Mr. HARRIS. I stated that I did not deem such an amendment or modification at all necessary, but I saw no serious objection to it and should not seriously oppose such an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts propose any other amendment than the one pending?

Mr. HOAR. I will move, then, to substitute for the words "any contagious or infectious disease" the words "cholera, yellow fever, plague, small-pox, and typhoid fever."

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that "ship-fever" (possibly it is typhoid) ought to be included.

Mr. HOAR. I will insert "ship-fever" instead of "typhoid fever," leaving that out. I do not think the introduction of typhoid fever from abroad is a matter that the nation can concern itself with.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts what he apprehends if the bill is left as it is in that regard?

Mr. HOAR. I apprehend an expansion. It is not always agreeable to narrate publicly local experiences with boards of this class, for obvious reasons. Nobody wants to be criticising the action of State boards. It is unnecessary, if not out of place, to be talking about such a thing; but I think a board constituted as this National Board of Health is will be found to be expanding its jurisdiction in every direction, and there is danger of very serious infringement of sound constitutional principles, of sound legal principles, and of the commercial interests of the country. I desire to have at least the authority given them defined.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know of any board of health that has undertaken to make rules and regulations quarantining against any other diseases than those he has named? Does the Senator know of an instance, I ask, where any board of health has undertaken to make rules and regulations quarantining against any other diseases than those named?

Mr. HOAR. If there is not any instance of that kind, then certainly it can be no harm to not give them power to do it.

Mr. HARRIS. So I think. I do not think there is any serious evil in naming the diseases.

Mr. HOAR. Then we agree.

Mr. HARRIS. But I do not see any necessity for the limitation. If there be a necessity for the clause as it stands in the bill it would be found in the possibility of some new contagious disease developing itself that would not fall into any of these classes named, and that the Board of Health should have power immediately to make such rules and regulations with regard to it as it deemed necessary.

Mr. HOAR. I think that the danger human experience shows is the danger of the expansion of power rather than of the sudden coming of a new disease so suddenly that no legislation can be had to prevent it. At any rate I will make the motion to amend, substituting, at the suggestion of the Senator from New York, the word "ship-fever" for "typhoid fever."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his previously offered amendment and propose this one?

Mr. HOAR. This one would come in first as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then temporarily the first amendment is laid aside. The Secretary will report the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to see that it is correctly taken down.

The SECRETARY. On line 4 of section 1, after the word "where," it is proposed to strike out the words "any contagious or infectious disease" and insert "cholera, yellow fever, plague, small-pox, or ship-fever;" so as to read:

That it shall be unlawful for any vessel engaged in the transportation of goods or persons from any foreign port where cholera, yellow fever, plague, small-pox, or ship-fever exists to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it seems to me that there might perhaps be some doubt about the propriety of the amendment. I remember some years ago that New Orleans was desolated by a terrible visitation of fever, and for some time it was a question of doubt what kind of disease it was. It was a fever supposed to have originated upon the coast of Africa and to have been communicated to the island of Cuba. I think it was in the year 1854. It was one of the most desolating and terrible plagues that ever visited the United States, and it was for a long time a question of discussion whether it was or was not the yellow fever. It seems to me that by making this amendment to the bill and specifying particular diseases you might open a question upon which doctors would disagree. I doubt very much whether it would not be better, better for the country, better for the objects sought to be attained by the bill, that it should be left general in its terms. Perhaps it might be better that the words of the bill should be changed so as to include any case where there was danger of an infectious disease, and to provide in case of abuse of a discretionary authority or a difference of opinion by the board that there should be some revisory power, some judicial power, which might be invoked. I make this suggestion because I feel a very deep interest in the passage of such a bill as will answer the ends sought to be attained. I think it perhaps may not be wise to undertake to define in the bill a disease by a particular name, which might be a matter of question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts renew his former amendment?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; that amendment is the one now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. In section 1 it is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including the word "thereof," in line 9, in the following words:

That it shall be unlawful for any vessel engaged in the transportation of goods or persons from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists, to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That whenever, in the opinion of the President of the United States, there is danger that cholera or yellow fever may be introduced from abroad into any port or place within the United States, or spread from State to State within the same, and in his judgment the existing quarantine or health regulations at such exposed places are insufficient, he may authorize the Board of Health to make further rules and regulations in the premises; which, being submitted to and approved by him, shall be valid and in force.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EATON. Section 8 of the bill provides:

That to meet the expenses to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be disbursed under the direction of the National Board of Health.

I have heard no Senator, not even the chairman of the committee who has the bill in charge, say a word in favor of the appropriation of this very large sum. Upon looking over the bill with great care, I cannot conceive that there is any necessity to expend $100,000. I have learned, and I presume most of my brother Senators have learned, that when you appropriate "$500,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary," it will all go, the whole of it. Every dollar will be "necessary" in some way; the money which is taken from the pockets of the people will be expended in some way. Now, unless the committee can show a necessity for the appropriation of this vast sum, I, for one, cannot vote for the bill. I propose to vote for the bill if I can. We appropriated the other day $250,000, $200,000 of which was absolutely unnecessary, in my judgment, if it was $250,000.

Mr. HARRIS. No, it was $200,000.

Mr. EATON. Very well, then; $150,000 was entirely unnecessary, a mere job, in my judgment. I cannot vote for the appropriation of this vast sum of money. I have looked the bill through with care. I cannot see where there is necessity to expend $100,000. If my friend from Tennessee will show me where he supposes there can be any such expenditure of money, then very well; I shall vote for it perhaps; but until he or somebody else does so, I must be permitted to exercise my own judgment in this matter and not vote at all for the bill. I shall move to amend the bill, unless good reason is shown me, by striking out "five" and inserting "one," making it $100,000, which, in my judgment, is $50,000 more than is necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. I endeavored some time since to explain, but the Senator from Connecticut happened not to be in his seat, the reasons why the appropriation of $500,000 was asked for in this bill. In the event of an epidemic such as occurred last year the Board of Health is satisfied, and I am perfectly satisfied, that $500,000 will be the least amount that it is safe to appropriate to meet the necessities of the board. In the event there is no such epidemic or no epidemic at all, then I think I can assure my honorable friend from Connecticut that no such sum as $500,000 will be expended by the Board of Health. I quite concur with him that there is no reason why such a sum should be expended, and I am confident that no such sum will be expended unless there is that imperative necessity which such an epidemic would produce. If such necessity shall exist I ask that the board shall not be crippled and paralyzed for the want of the means necessary to check and stay the progress and spread of the disease. I shall insist upon the appropriation remaining as it stands in the bill: "$500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. EATON. What section of the bill does the Senator from Tennessee found his opinion upon that even in case of an epidemic there would be any necessity for the expenditure of this money? Will he be kind enough to tell me?

Mr. HARRIS. I will inform the Senator from Connecticut that the third section provides that where there are no quarantine regulations, and in the opinion of the National Board of Health quarantine regulations are necessary to prevent the importation of diseases, or where there are quarantine regulations in existence, and in the opinion of the National Board of Health they are not sufficient to prevent the importation of diseases into the country, or from one State to another, if the President is satisfied when the facts are reported to him by the board that such necessity exists, he shall order the Board of Health to make such rules and regulations as are necessary for that purpose.

If the State authorities do not enforce them, then it is the duty of the President to detail or appoint an officer to enforce them. In the event of such an epidemic as we had last year I can assure my honorable friend that $500,000 would be a very small estimate for the various duties that will devolve upon the Board of Health in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations and the construction of such buildings and such other appliances as will be found absolutely necessary to prevent the spread of disease from one State to another. Five hundred thousand dollars is a very small estimate, in my opinion, if it is found necessary in the coming year to exercise the powers in the manner and to the extent I have suggested.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] when on the floor last made the speech that I wanted to make, or rather disliked to make, though I thought I ought to make it; and he expressed it a good deal better than I could myself. I dislike extremely to vote against this bill, but I cannot vote for $500,000 to be placed at the command of this Board of Health upon the conditions named by the Senator from Tennessee.

We passed, I think at the last session of Congress, a bill organizing this National Board of Health, and appropriated $50,000 for its expenditures. They were in session in this city a few days; and in looking over the broad expanse of the United States and then extending their observations over the whole earth, they came here with a recommendation for $650,000, the very first estimate submitted. I have never seen an institution organized in this country grow as rapidly as this Board of Health has done. I have great faith in the medical fraternity in this country. I have great respect for them. I am willing to place any reasonable amount of money at their disposal; but I am not willing to place half a million dollars at their absolute disposal unless we have some better reason than that assigned by the Senator from Tennessee, in my judgment, for appropriating it.

It has already been said by the Senator from Connecticut, and I think truly, that whatever amount of money is appropriated under such circumstances will be used, and I have no doubt used conscientiously, by those gentlemen. They believe that the Government has no special use for money except to advance the interests of science and medical knowledge and to make such investigations as they may deem advisable within the jurisdiction of this board. At least, if they do not believe there is no other use, I have no doubt they are of the opinion that most professional gentlemen are, that this is the most important use that can be made of public money, and therefore, having it at their disposal, there is no sort of doubt in my judgment that their investigations will be extended all over the face of the earth; and whether they will be of any value or not, I do not know.

I am willing to vote any amount of money that is necessary. If some condition could be provided whereby upon the certificate or otherwise of the President of the United States that the conditions mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee have occurred, that yellow fever or some other contagious disease is threatening the country or a portion of it, a larger amount of money might be used, I should have no objection to it. I would be willing to vote conditionally for a large amount; but when it is proposed to place $500,000 absolutely at the command of this board to do as they please with it, under a bill of this character, I am sorry to say I shall have to vote against the bill. Unless the amount should be reduced I cannot vote for it. I would vote for rather more than the Senator from Connecticut has stated; I would be willing to give $200,000; but that is the farthest I am willing to vote, unless some condition can be made that shall authorize the use of a larger sum in case an epidemic does prevail in the country.

Mr. WITHERS. Would the object of the Senator be attained by adding a provision to that effect, restricting the amount to be expended to a small sum in the event that no epidemic or contagious disease shall visit this country during the next year?

Mr. WINDOM. That would meet my view if some proper amendment could be provided to cover it, but the difficulty would be in drawing such an amendment, in proper form.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there any year in which there is no epidemic in this country?

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer an amendment if there is no other amendment to be offered now. After the word "the," in the fifth line of section 8, I move to strike out the words:

National Board of Health, which shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury a full and accurate report of its operations under this act, and of all expenditures connected therewith, to be by him reported to Congress.

And to insert:

Secretary of the Treasury, on estimates to be made by the National Board of Health, and to be approved by him. Said National Board of Health shall as often as quarterly make a full statement of its operations and expenditures under this act to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall report the same to Congress.

So as to make the section read:

That to meet the expenses to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, on estimates to be made by the National Board of Health, &c.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am a member of the select committee; but, unfortunately for myself, when the bill was under consideration in committee I was not in the city, and had not an opportunity to investigate the subject. It strikes me that such an amendment as is now proposed would be a very proper one, and I desire myself to vote for the amendment. I think such a check as this in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury is a very proper one. It seems to me that the objection which has been raised by some Senators in reference to the laxity of the provision as to the discretion of the board in regard to its expenditures is a very good one. I desire, as a member of the committee, to say, so far as I am concerned, that I think it would be well for the committee to accept the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood from the Senator who has charge of the bill and other Senators favoring it that if there was to be no epidemic prevailing the next year the expenditures would be small. To meet that very suggestion this amendment has been drafted. It provides that the Board of Health shall make estimates upon which this money is to be paid out by the Secretary of the Treasury, the payments to be approved by him, so that if there should be no epidemic the Secretary of the Treasury will be a check on the board in the expenditure of this $500,000; and if such a thing should occur, then the Secretary of the Treasury, like everybody else, would be willing, as a matter of course, to agree to the largest expenditure necessary for the purpose of interposing such barriers as might be thought proper by the Board of Health. I cannot see wherein there can be any objection to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see any serious objection to the amendment. I shall not oppose it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EATON. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois to section 8 has now become a part of the bill. At the suggestion of several friends, I desire to vote for this bill, and I am very anxious to do so. It is ungracious and thankless to oppose a bill of this character. I am aware of that fact, and I feel it as much as any man can feel it, and yet I think there should be reasonable bounds to the appropriation. I move to strike out "$500,000," in line 2 of section 8, and to insert "$250,000." I have no idea myself that $250,000 can be used if there should be an epidemic under the bill as it is described by section 3. I have no such idea at all, but I desire to vote for it, and therefore I want to make the amount so large that it will meet with general approbation.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I do not think there is any disposition in the Senate to deprive this board of all necessary funds to carry out proper regulations and do all that may be in their power to effect the object for which they have been created; but I think, notwithstanding that, we should throw every safeguard around this matter within our power and we should take notice that this is a new subject of legislation and administration on the part of this Government. We have had no experience in this effort that we are now engaged in carrying out by legislation. We do not know what is to be the purpose and plan of this board from anything in the past. Not only is this a new step, but these are new men in the administration of public affairs. It was only when the bill first introduced at the present session was up that they were so carried away with the idea of a single individual in reference to a refrigerating ship that they were disposed to ask Congress to enact that they should make a contract with that particular individual at an expense of $200,000 to construct a steel ship for a particular purpose, and that was adhered to with as much tenacity and honest conviction on their part as any feature of this bill. It was, however, after a good deal of struggle, opened to a general provision to procure the best possible vessel, constructed in the most economical manner and of such material as experience, as study, and as investigation should demonstrate was the best. It is now perfectly apparent, from what has been developed since the passage of that bill, that for $15,000 there can be constructed a refrigerating vessel that will maintain a temperature in every part of it just as long as you please at eight or ten degrees below zero, and so far has the necessity of doing something in this line stimulated invention that nobody would now think for a moment of doing what this board insisted upon in the beginning was absolutely necessary.

Mr. PADDOCK. May I inquire of the Senator if the cheaper plan of which he speaks as the plan that has been found to be practicable has been adopted?

Mr. DAWES. I do not speak of the adoption by this board of anything of the kind. I speak of what is being done in the inventive world, what is being accomplished, and what can be done.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understood the Senator to say in regard to this particular matter, the construction of a refrigerating ship, that it had been ascertained that $15,000 could do exactly the thing that it had been proposed by legislation to do. Is it the fact that that is being done, does he know?

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean to say that it has been demonstrated to the minds of these men.

Mr. PADDOCK. Then I think I and the Senate inferred too much from the statement of the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I meant to say that it had been demonstrated to practical men, to all practical men who have looked into it. How can these learned doctors, professional men, skilled and celebrated in a profession in which no man can become celebrated who does not devote his whole life exclusively to its study, be as well prepared to understand what can be done in mechanics as those who devote their lives to mechanics? And it is because I want these men to profit by such experiences as this, that I wish them to have proper safeguards thrown around what they do, and not put all the Treasury at their command. I never before heard of putting half a million dollars in the hands of an inexperienced, new commission, created for a new work, in which they had had no experience, to be expended without limit, without direction, simply empowered to expend so much of it as in their judgment would be best in any kind of experiment, in any kind of theoretical investigation, in any kind of preparation for the future into which they may launch honestly; everybody understands that. I do not impute anything but an honest and earnest desire on the part of these doctrinaires to accomplish whatever they think is most desirable in this new field. I shall go for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PADDOCK. Does not the Senator understand, after the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, that the whole matter, after all, is placed entirely within the control and under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury in respect of the disbursements, the estimates, and all that shall be done in connection with it.

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand it to be entirely so.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do.

Mr. BLAINE. I have not paid as much attention as I ought to have done to the details of this bill; but I feel very reluctant to higgle over the amount that shall be placed at the control of a board who are empowered to take measures for the prevention of the introduction of yellow fever. When it was here last year millions, yea tens of millions, even in the material point of view, to say nothing of the far higher considerations involved, would have been poured out to prevent its spread. If we are entering upon an experiment of this kind—and to a large extent we all know it must be experimental—do not let us do it grudgingly. It is a great calamity that impends not only over the southern portion of the country but possibly over the whole of it, and I do not want to go away from here voting that we will restrict this board down to a certain sum when a certain other sum might become imperatively necessary. What is a million or two million, or five million dollars even, as against the possibilities of the repetition of the terrible scenes and the terrible suffering of last summer?

Mr. PADDOCK. Or in comparison with the devastation resulting from the epidemic last year?

Mr. BLAINE. Merely in a material point of view what is it? A thing of this kind ought to be done generously, of course with proper guards; but if we are to institute a board of health, let us give them ample power and ample funds to prosecute any experiment at all that promises in the judgment of scientific men to raise any bar against the ingress of this terrible fatality again. I shall vote against reducing the amount.

Mr. DAWES. I do not quite understand what the Senator from Maine means by "doing this grudgingly."

Mr. BLAINE. Reducing the amount proposed by the board and the committee.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know of any Senator who would grudge any money that might be properly expended toward alleviating the distress or preventing the ravages of the yellow fever. It is not that. The Senator from Maine seems to speak as if the whole thing was to be measured by the amount of money to be expended, and that if we only poured out money enough upon the region devastated by this terrible calamity it would be all that would be required of us; that that was sufficient. If that was so we should turn the Treasury over upon it. There is not a Senator who would not be willing, to the extent and the limit of the Treasury itself, to put a stop to the yellow fever; but the yellow fever is not to be stopped by the mere amount of money expended. It is the mode of its expenditure, the judicious mode of expenditure of the money which is to be effective. Put it in the hands of inexperienced men who measure their work only by the amount of money they expend, and my distinguished friend from Maine thinks we have done our duty, thinks we have generously put a stop to the yellow fever. I do not understand that it is to be coped with in that way. I understand it is a great study, and any benefit is only accomplished by a judicious expenditure of the money.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought when my friend from Massachusetts began to talk that I must have mistaken the amendment I was speaking to, but I certified the matter by going to the Clerk's desk. The amendment pending is the motion of the honorable Senator from Connecticut to reduce the amount to $250,000. Why, suppose in midsummer, when Congress is dissolved, as we hope it may be, and as it certainly will be if the yellow fever comes around this part of the world very speedily, [laughter,] when Congress is gone and we no longer can make the appropriation—suppose yellow fever should come upon us, and then $250,000 extra should be very greatly needed, when in the judgment of scientific men the use of it at the right moment might be of overwhelming importance, I certainly for one would not feel very comfortable if I was in a safe and remote place away from the ravages of the disease and knew that by a vote of that kind I had kept away some possibility of relief from those who were more immediately exposed. That was what I intended to intimate. I did not of course mean that the mere pouring out of money would be of service in suppressing the disease; but all the people of the country, North, South, East, and West, last year were called upon to contribute money and contribute everything else that could stay the ravages of the scourge. Material aid was of great value. Now we have an opportunity, by a proper contribution from the National Treasury, to adopt preventive means, and for one I want those to be as thorough as the magnitude of the danger may inspire the need of; and that is the reason why I will vote against reducing this amount.

Mr. DAWES. Why does the Senator fix the sum to be voted at $500,000?

Mr. BLAINE. Because it happens to be in the bill; and if it happened to be more in the judgment of those who had examined the subject, I would vote for that. I would vote for whatever judgment the committee had reported. If it had been more I would have been against reducing it. I find that amount there.

Mr. INGALLS. And this sum is also recommended by the Board of Health as being the least they can possibly get along with in the case of an invasion of disease.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill what disposition is to be made of this money, how it is to be expended? I have not heard anybody state. Are we to clean the cities in the country that is liable to be devastated? Are we to furnish supplies to those who may be afflicted? How is it to be expended? Nobody on the floor of the Senate has stated that I am aware of.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Colorado had examined the bill, I imagine he would not have asked the question.

Mr. TELLER. I have carefully examined it.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will find upon re-examination that the third section of the bill makes it the duty of this National Board of Health not only to co-operate with, but to aid State and municipal boards of health in the execution and enforcement of their rules and regulations to the extent and so far as they may tend to prevent the importation of contagious diseases into the country from abroad or from one State into another. It makes it the duty of the National Board of Health to make rules and regulations where none exist and they are deemed necessary; and where rules and regulations do exist, if thought insufficient it is the duty of the National Board of Health to make such as will be sufficient, and to enforce them.

Now in the event of an epidemic, as I have endeavored to explain on two other occasions since this bill has been under consideration, the Board of Health will find it necessary to make rules and regulations in many localities where none exist; it will find it necessary perhaps to supplement rules and regulations that do exist, and in these new localities it will find it necessary to construct temporary or other buildings for quarantine purposes, the cost of which it is difficult to estimate; but, certainly, $500,000 is a very small estimate if we have an epidemic such as we had in 1878. There will be abundant and legitimate necessity for the expenditure of every dollar of the $500,000 if such an epidemic should scourge the country as did a year ago. If we have no epidemic, then I am prepared to believe and do believe that nothing like that amount will be expended. But why paralyze the board by this economy that would fail to put it in the power of the board to perform the important duties that you propose to charge it with?

Mr. TELLER. The honorable Senator has only partially answered my question. I supposed from the statement made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] that this Board of Health had submitted to this committee an estimate of the amount of money that they required It would be most singular and astonishing if with that estimate they should not have submitted the method of expenditure and for what purposes. That is what I think we ought to have had from the committee. The honorable Senator answers in part by saying that if there is an epidemic they will build buildings; but if there is no epidemic they will still have the $500,000. Is it to be used as a preventive? Are you to clean the cities or are they to use it only after the epidemic comes?

Mr. HARRIS. The operations of the Board of Health under this bill are confined to a single object, to aid in the enforcement of or to enforce such rules and regulations as tend to prevent the importation of contagious disease from foreign countries into the United States and from one State into another.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that pretty well; the bill so states.

Mr. HARRIS. Very clearly.

Mr. TELLER. That is not my trouble.

Mr. HARRIS. Now, whatever expenditure may be necessary to aid that purpose will be a legitimate expenditure for the Board of Health to make; and in addition to the aid that it may give to those local associations or boards it may find it necessary, as I endeavored to explain a moment since, to construct in the interior, for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease from one State into another, quarantine buildings. It is difficult to estimate to what extent, it is difficult to determine what they are to cost, but in the opinion of the Board of Health, who have maturely considered the subject, and in my opinion and in the opinion of the committee, $500,000 is the very least amount that ought to be appropriated and subjected to their uses in the event an epidemic shall prevail and the necessity shall arise for the construction of buildings in the interior or on the seaboard where buildings do not exist and are necessary to the enforcement of the rules and regulations that are prescribed by this bill.

Mr. TELLER. We are just as much in the dark after the honorable Senator gets through as we were when he began. I defy anybody to say, after hearing the honorable Senator now and on any other occasion—for I have listened to him every time—whether this board are to commence now a preventive effort to clean cities with this $500,000, or whether they are to retain it for the purpose——

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Colorado is the only one that is left in the dark as to what is the object and purpose.

Mr. TELLER. What I want to know is this: is the United States expected to do the duty of cleaning the cities? If so, then $500,000 is not enough. It is not quarter enough, it is not a tenth part enough if that is the object and purpose. If we ought to commit ourselves to that, then when we agree to do that, when we assume that that is our duty, we want to vote very much more money than this. If it is not our duty, then I say that there is too much money voted here unless it is our duty to support the destitute and the suffering when the fever comes, and then we have not enough. If we are to furnish food and clothing and medical attendance, as the charity of the people did last year, if the Government is to take the place of that great charity of last season, then there is not enough; but if it is for the simple purpose of making rules and regulations, which has been the thing the honorable Senator has seemed to rest upon until within the last few moments——

Mr. HARRIS. And enforcing the rules and regulations.

Mr. TELLER. And enforcing these regulations, then it seems to me that $500,000 is too much. But the trouble is that we are left here by the committee without any idea of what they intend to do except in a sort of general way that they are to fight the yellow fever and any other contagious disease that gets into the country.

Mr. HARRIS. Either I or the Senator from Colorado must have been very unfortunate——

Mr. TELLER. Undoubtedly it was the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HARRIS. I in my mode of expression or he in his failure to understand.

The Senator states that he is still as much in the dark as when he asked the question, and reiterates the question as to whether or not the money appropriated is to be expended in cleaning cities, or in what manner it is to be expended. I had distinctly twice answered the Senator. I had first answered him by telling him the only purpose for which this appropriation could be applied, that of enforcing rules and regulations to prevent the introduction of disease into the country or into one State from another. I had distinctly answered that not one copper could be applied to the cleaning of cities or to the general sanitary work of cities.

Mr. TELLER. Why not? You do not restrict it.

Mr. HARRIS. If the language that the board is to aid in enforcing the rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing the introduction of disease into the country from abroad or into one State from another is a restriction, and it was intended to be such, and I apprehend the Senator from Colorado is the only Senator upon this floor who does not so construe it, appropriating it to this specific purpose and to no other is a restriction. Here it is so restricted. I hope the Senator now understands, as does the Senate, the objects and purposes for which this appropriation is asked.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I have one word to say in reply to the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] Listening to his remarks one would naturally infer that the opposition to this bill came from niggardly feelings on the part of Senators opposed to it in reference to appropriations. I think if he had listened to the debate on this bill he would have perhaps come to a little different conclusion. I oppose the general provisions of this bill not on account of the appropriation, but because of the manner in which the appropriation is to be used, for I believe that the law already on the statute-book sufficiently empowers this committee of physicians to examine the question and ascertain the facts that they are authorized by the law to ascertain, and that the expenditure of money in the execution of the regulations prescribed should be made by those in the Government charged with that power and authority under existing laws. On this was the objection to this bill based, and I also opposed the expenditure of large sums of money without any declaration whatever in the statute with regard to why or for what they should be expended.

Now let me make a suggestion to the honorable Senator from Maine or any other Senator who thinks this is higgling over a mere matter of amount when a great scourge may perhaps prevail in this country like the yellow fever. Suppose this provision in reference to $500,000 should read in this way, that when the rules and regulations are made by this National Board of Health for the purpose of preventing these different diseases from coming into the country as well as can be, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to execute these regulations; and to appropriating such amount as should be necessary for that purpose, I would not object if an epidemic prevailed in this country; neither would any one. It is not the amount of money, but it is the part of the Government that shall expend the money appropriated, which is the main point now involved.

Then, again, suppose there is no appropriation bill for the Army of the United States and a great massacre should occur in the State of Nebraska or Kansas or some of our border States or Territories, where then is the expenditure to meet the emergency to come from? Why would it not be well, if the gentleman thinks there is higgling about this appropriation, to let the bill go giving the power to make rules, wherever they may be applicable, to this board, and let the appropriation be in some appropriation bill for the Secretary of the Treasury to expend it? Why is it that money must be appropriated for one particular thing to prevent plagues in the country, and at the same time none shall be appropriated for the purpose of preventing massacres or disasters that might occur of a different kind?

It is not higgling about the money; it is not higgling about the appropriation; it is in reference to the manner in which the money shall be applied that the objection has been made to this bill. I said when first up, and I say now, $500,000 is appropriated without any line showing for what purpose it shall be used. That is the objection to it. I would be in favor of allowing the appropriation to apply according to the necessity of the case, not that persons should be permitted to squander the money of the Government irrespective of whether there shall be an epidemic in the country or not. That is the objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to strike out "$500,000" and insert "$250,000."

Mr. BLAINE. I think the honorable Senator from Illinois himself suggested an amendment, which was agreed to by the Senate, I believe without objection, covering all the points of the kind he has suggested and sufficiently covering the outlay of this appropriation.

Mr. LOGAN. The amendment I suggested was for the purpose of requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to have the power to approve the estimates made by this board, so as to restrict them somewhat, and to that the Senate agreed.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me read it; it is a very judicious amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me. I was speaking in the line of objection to the general provision of the bill that I had opposed, and so had others.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Illinois, which the Senate I believe without objection agreed to, was that the money should be disbursed "under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, on estimates to be made by the National Board of Health and to be approved by him;" and "said National Board of Health shall as often as quarterly make a full statement," &c.

It seems to me that covers the expenditure with sufficient care; and with regard to the intimation my friend from Illinois makes, that somebody else may be opposed to giving proper money for the support of the Army of the United States to suppress dangers in other directions, that is no argument why we should not be perfectly just and fair in other respects. While we are for suppressing dangers in other directions in regard to which both the Senator from Illinois and myself agree, we ought, at all events, to do all in our power here. I did not use the word "higgling" in any offensive way. We ought to do, under this well-guarded restriction, all that is asked by the Board of Health and the committee, it seems to me, as in some degree a contribution to this great object.

Mr. LOGAN. I am as ready as the Senator from Maine to do all that is required and that is proper to be done to accomplish the purpose professed to be in view here. I will not say that the Senator dodges, but he does not perhaps see the point that has been made in opposition to this bill. It was not an objection to the amount of money appropriated, but the objection was to the manner of its expenditure. The objection was that power is taken away from where it has been lodged by the law prior to this bill that is now before the Senate, in other Departments of the Government, and lodged in this particular board. That was the argument made; and my objection, as I said, was to the amount to be expended without its being restricted in any way whatever. I did object and object yet so far as that is concerned. The remark that I made about a massacre that might occur on the border had no application whatever to an objection that might be raised to appropriating money in this particular instance on that account. I had no such intention. My reference was to the fact that great damage might be done in cases where no money at all was appropriated, and that this part of the bill might as well go with the other appropriations to be put on the appropriation bills; and so I say now it might just as well be there as anywhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to strike out "five hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty."

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 33; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator from Tennessee. Some time ago another bill on this subject was before the Senate and it passed, appropriating $200,000 for a disinfecting ship. The bill came from the committee naming a particular person as the contractor. The name was stricken out, I believe, and the bill in some degree provided for competition. Will the Senator from Tennessee tell me, if he knows, what has become thus far of that disinfecting-ship experiment, and especially whether the plan of the person originally named which the bill at first proposed to adopt absolutely, is still under consideration; or whether it has been dismissed and rejected practically as altogether futile? I ask this question because I have information, not so direct as the Senator from Tennessee has probably, which, if it be correct, is rather instructive on this general subject.

Mr. HARRIS. While I am perfectly willing to give to the honorable Senator from New York the fullest measure of information I have on that subject, and will do so with great pleasure, exactly how far it is pertinent to the passage of this bill I am at a loss to perceive; but no matter.

The bill as it became a law provided that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to contract for the construction or purchase of such vessel and refrigerating machines as may be recommended by the National Board of Health for the purpose of disinfecting vessels engaged in commerce. The Board of Health has had the matter under consideration, I was some week or ten days since advised, and that they had referred certain plans that the Board of Health had agreed upon to a board of naval engineers and naval constructors for their inspection and estimates. I have no information as to how they have progressed.

As to whether the precise plan of John Gamgee, who was named in the bill as it was originally introduced, or a plan differing from that in some respects is being considered, I am not advised and cannot inform the honorable Senator. My impression is that no contract for the construction or purchase of a vessel has been entered into, but that impression is based on the fact that I have heard nothing of such contract, and think it probable I should have been informed of it if such a contract had been made. The matter was under consideration when I last heard of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if I may do so without reflecting upon anybody (and in sincerity I can and do disclaim all intention to reflect upon anybody,) I will inform the Senator from Tennessee why I asked this question and what it has to do in my estimation with the matter which proceeds to-day.

Under the influence of the feeling which everybody must have, apart from all material, pecuniary, or commercial considerations, the feeling of solicitude about the danger of such a scourge as visited a part of the country last year, a committee of this body reported a bill requiring that $250,000 be applied——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will allow me to say that he labors under a mistake as to the amount. It was $200,000, and not $250,000.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon then. I thought it was originally $250,000 and had fallen down to $200,000 under subsequent action of the committee or of the Senate; but the Senator no doubt is right and I am wrong. Two hundred thousand dollars was the amount. Such a bill was reported by the committee. It came here and was about to pass this body under circumstances very similar to those which to-day carry forward the pending bill. I believe I ventured myself originally to challenge the propriety of that legislation, to query whether in addition to everything else a particular individual should be named and, off-hand, forthwith, peremptorily, we should proceed to devote $200,000 to his plan, and to be paid to him. We were told if I remember aright—I have not looked at the RECORD to see,—and told in sincerity no doubt, that here was this inventor, this man of science, as he is for aught I know, (because I do not intend to impeach him in any remarks I make) who was ready, whose plans were ready, the demonstration of whose capacity to do this thing was all ready and had been submitted to the scrutiny of those who had adjudged it, and we were urged at once to devote this money to that purpose. Upon its being suggested and pressed with some perseverance that that was an unusual mode of making provision even where provision should be made, that competition was usually tolerated if not invited, consent was given in qualified form under which the particular inventor there named need not be the only one whose apparatus or device might be employed. Now I am told—I cannot vouch for the accuracy of it although I received my information to-day from a very intelligent informant who seemed to know whereof he spoke—that, although up to this time, as the Senator from Tennessee states or conjectures, no particular plan has been hit upon, no contract has been made, no assurance has been arrived at that the experiment intended can be made or that the persons or machines to make it can be found, those who have been investigating and adjudging the matter have gone so far as practically to dispense altogether and give over hope altogether in respect of the one inventor, the one process and apparatus which was brought here so plausibly and so convincingly as to satisfy the committee and lead them to come in and invite the Senate to pass a bill under which nobody but this inventor and no process and apparatus but his could have been invoked for this purpose.

If this be true, Mr. President, it seems to me that it not only has to do with the matter now before us, but that it is full of instruction touching the danger, the unwisdom, if I may so say, of going on, under spur of this feeling which we all share, to attempt by legislation hazardous and more than uncertain remedies.

Before leaving altogether this matter of a disinfecting ship, I will make one frank avowal, not presumptuous I hope, because when called upon to vote each of us is compelled to vote upon the lights, feeble and limited as they may be, which each one has. Now, without professing to know a great deal on this topic, but it having been once my duty professionally to bestow some time upon the processes known in this country and also known in France for producing ice by chemical methods, that is producing by the use of volatile gases a temperature lower than 32° in an atmosphere of much higher temperature, I did not believe it possible that machinery could be put afloat in any vessel or any vehicles to be carried on water, to oscillate and rock and move, as every floating thing must do, with which this process could be successfully carried on. On the contrary I believed it was not possible; and yet I satisfied my conscience, as far as I did satisfy it in abstaining from such opposition as I might have made in that case, because there was some chance, and more especially because the honorable Senator from Tennessee, whose intelligence we well know and rely upon, and other Senators, and persons beyond the Senate, believed the experiment worth trying. And although my own information on the subject would have led me to the opposite belief, and did lead me there, still, as I say, I felt authorized, excused, if not justified, in yielding at least a tacit assent to that experiment.

I think the same disposition under which I acted then, in no degree diminished, actuates me to-day; but with all that good disposition I certainly cannot vote for this bill. I will not ask Senators to hear all my reasons; I shall venture, however, to occupy a few moments in stating some of them, and at the threshold I inquire, and I address the inquiry to every Senator individually, who has heard in any of these discussions the reason assigned why the States in question do not take the measures proposed in this bill or said to be made necessary by the approach of yellow fever? Who has heard that reason given? Who has given it? Who will give it now? I heard the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND,] well qualified for such a task, review certain decisions made by the Supreme Court, his apparent object being to show that the court had criticised, if it had not abridged, the power of the States touching certain regulations of commerce. Did that honorable Senator find a decision, does a decision exist, made by any court of record—I will not confine my question to the Supreme Court of the United States—denying the power of the States to pass health laws, pilot laws, quarantine laws, laws in the nature of police regulations touching their harbors, their ports, their waters and the shores adjacent to them? I would gladly yield to any Senator who can inform me of such a decision, and I would give him my thanks as well for such a piece of information. I know that the Supreme Court in the passenger cases said various things; I know that the court in the head-money cases said various things; I know that when one of the States of this Union insisted for long years that every person who crossed her soil by rail should pay a tax or a fine or a tribute of a dollar or a dollar and a half, queries sprang up in the minds of lawyers everywhere as to the authority of a State by its legislation to do such a thing. But again I inquire for an instance in which the Supreme Court or any court of record has undertaken to impeach the right of the States to exercise all those powers which Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden enumerated and described as powers left to the States, and not taken from the States by the commercial clause of the Constitution.

We are not left to theorize upon this subject; we are not left to depend upon the absence of judicial authority denying this power. I am able to resort to the convenient and conclusive argument, for such the fact becomes, that my own State for example, unchallenged by any court, unquestioned by any national authority, long years ago established and has ever since maintained, bringing to greater and greater perfection by large expenditures, a health office and quarantine ground so thorough, so sufficient in the office it does that not one case of yellow fever has ever broken through this corral. Although yellow fever at every season of every year when it could prevail floats in the bay of New York, although the ships of all nationalities enter that bay and lie there at anchor, although eighty-four languages and dialects are spoken in the city of New York and her streets are trodden by visitors from every clime and every nationality, so perfect is the barrier erected at her gates that yellow fever never once has entered, nor has plague, nor has other imported pestilence.

I show you a case, therefore, legally and actually existing, in which a State has always asserted and to the satisfaction of all persons concerned, the power intended to be conveyed to somebody else by this bill. I have spoken of one State simply because I know the fact in respect of that State, and also because of the greater number of ships which come to the port to which I have referred. The same thing is true elsewhere.

Why is it that in Arkansas in which we are told a shot-gun quarantine was maintained last year, and no other, why is it that in Arkansas standing as she does in midsummer in the very jaws of death with pestilence at her threshold, laws are not enacted, quarantine laws, health laws, such as Connecticut has, such as Massachusetts has, such as Maine I believe has, such as New Jersey has, and, as my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests, such as Maryland has. No doubt she has them; I do not speak by the book as probably the Senator does. Why is it, these States, exemplifying, illustrating the power and its adequacy to shut the doors against foreign pestilence, that States nearer danger, more immediately threatened, do not close the doors?

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator will permit me to say that there are only seventeen States that pretend to have what are called quarantine laws.

Mr. CONKLING. Only seventeen States. Then, Mr. President, that enables me to specify exactly the number of States as to which I inquire, why do they not have quarantine laws? Is anxiety, diligence, enterprise on this subject in the ratio of the distance, or in the ratio of the absence of danger and occasion? Is the rule of common sense reversed? Does Maine build barriers against the yellow fever, and Arkansas and Mississippi and Louisiana leave the doors open? Why is that?

Mr. President, I do not ask the question without knowing the answer. I ask it, though I know the answer. Nobody has chosen to give it. I do not choose to give it. The truth is an inestimable thing. It is not always agreeable. It is by no means pleasant or even incumbent upon any man at all times to speak the whole truth. Whatever he says should be true, but there are a great many unwelcome truths that he is not bound to obtrude; sometimes because his motives would be misunderstood, and he may excuse himself; and so I do not choose to subject myself to misconstruction. We all know why this is. But if there be a reason for it which will bear publicity and defense, I should like to hear it stated.

There is no doubt that in all the Gulf States from the northernmost of the Carolinas, represented by my friend near me, [Mr. RANSOM,] around to the mouth of the Mississippi and as far up the Mississippi as latitude and temperature give special sign of danger of pestilence, there is special occasion for quarantine and health laws, and for the regulations and the establishments which experience has proved valuable to shut out disease. Why are they not established? My honorable friend [Mr. RANSOM] says they exist in North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. I have the North Carolina act here now.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says he has the act of his State in hand, the act by which she exerts this power, never challenged to my knowledge, and which nothing in the world forbids every State from exerting. For a reason, I repeat, which has not been stated, whether understood or not, it is proposed by national authority to supply this want.

Ordinarily he who rises in the Senate to criticise a measure should be able to propose something adequate in its stead; but there is one limitation to this rule. It applies only to a case in which national legislation is proper and to which national legislation is adequate. That case is not this case; and therefore I hold myself amenable to no just criticism when I go no further than to show the objections to the pending measure, without attempting to produce, as I freely admit my inability to do, a substitute for it adequate to the purpose and which would still avoid the objections. And I beg the honorable Senator from Tennessee and those with him on the committee who have bestowed so much time on this subject to understand that I fully appreciate their embarrassments and their difficulties; and the very fact that out of all their considerations has come a measure no more defensible than this, so open to flagrant objections of law and of expediency as this, is confirmation almost as strong as proof from Holy Writ of the inapplicability of the provisions of the Constitution which they have been driven to invoke.

They have proceeded under the commercial clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and which has annexed to it as a condition—practically a condition in this case—a provision declaring that no regulation of commerce shall give preference to one port over another. Taking the two provisions together, here is a committee compelled to rely upon a power which power forbids it to make discriminations between ports, between latitudes, between zones, when dealing with a region having five thousand miles of coast, dealing with thirty-eight States covering all the varied conditions of temperature and circumstances to be found between the mouth of the Bay of Fundy and the mediterranean sea of Mexico.

Thus the committee has been compelled to make all ports and places share and share alike virtually in the distribution of these national favors and the distillation of this national dew. We need go no further to comprehend the perplexity, vexation, and I think I may say insurmountable difficulty, which its members found in their way. These provisions of the Constitution were designed for no such purpose. They are awkward in the extreme when used as an implement for such an occasion. Skillful, adequate, appropriate to the purposes for which they were designed, when you come to wrench them from their place, dislocate them in their connection, and apply them to something entirely different, the very fact that they were apt and well directed looking at their end was enough of itself to create almost a certainty that they would be ill-adapted and inconvenient when applied to something different.

Let us look a moment, confining our observation to only a few lines of this bill, and see the product of the effort of a number of intelligent gentlemen to invent, thus hampered, provisions for the purpose they had in hand. I read some of the opening lines of the bill:

That it shall be unlawful for any vessel engaged in the transportation of goods or persons from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists to enter any port of the United States, except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof; and any such vessel which shall enter, or attempt to enter, a port of the United States, in violation thereof, shall forfeit to the United States a sum, to be awarded in the discretion of the court, not exceeding $5,000, which shall be a lien upon said vessel, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States. And in all such proceedings the United States district attorney for such district shall appear on behalf of the United States, and all such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the rules and laws governing cases of seizure of vessels for violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. President, can a lawyer discover in any kaleidoscope through which he can look, a more remarkable jumble of discordant fragments than are here found? Think of two or three things which it involves. Did anybody ever hear before of an act of Congress punishing as a crime assault and battery, for example, committed in the State of Ohio in violation of a statute of Ohio, punishing that as an offense against national authority? This section undertakes to do it. If I shall be answered that assault and battery does not relate to quarantine regulations or to health laws, I say respectfully that is no answer at all. I am dealing with this as a legal proposition. The State of New York has health laws and quarantine laws. They are State statutes. They are competent statutes or they are void; they are statutes passed under that great residuum of sovereignty and legislative power left to the individual States, or they are utterly null and void, because they are passed in respect of powers parted with and made over by the State of New York, when she ratified the Constitution, to the Government of the United States. Which are they? Are they competent, lawful statutes, or are they, in the language of Lord Coke, enactments to be held utterly for naught? In applying the test to this section, I do not care in which light they shall be regarded. If they are incompetent, and therefore void enactments, all the more monstrous is it to undertake by national statute to punish their breach as an offense of national authority. If they are competent, valid State statutes, then they are just like the statutes punishing forcible entry and detainer, punishing forgery, punishing assault and battery, punishing the obtaining of goods or money by false pretenses or false tokens, are they not? Legally and constitutionally speaking, are they not State statutes in each of the instances I have quoted, of equal authority, and of identical legal nature each with the other? Is it possible that by national statute you can punish a citizen of the State of New York for committing forgery in violation of a statute of New York, for engaging in riot in violation of a statute of New York, for doing any other harm to the statutes of the State of New York? Yet this section undertakes to do that.

But that is not all. It is not the most extraordinary of three things to which I want to draw attention in this connection. The section goes further and proposes double punishment by criminal prosecution. English-speaking people, of whom we have heard so much, and Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence has held for a great while that no man is to be twice put in peril of life or limb; that no man is to be twice incarcerated, twice convicted, twice punished for one and the same offense. If I understand this language, it contemplates that he who violates the statutes of the State of New York shall remain triable, of course, as he is, in the courts of New York for violating the laws of New York, and shall suffer the penalties denounced by New York for that violation; and then, in addition to that, separate and apart from that, he may be prosecuted under national authority, prosecuted for what? For the same offense, namely, having violated the statutes of the State of New York; and he cannot plead a former acquittal or a former conviction; on the contrary, the whole theory embraced in this branch of the law is given to the winds by this provision.

But again, and if possible more strangely still, a citizen of the State of New York or one domiciled in New York who does an act violative of the health laws or the quarantine laws of that Commonwealth, he may be prosecuted, as I have said, in the State courts and punished, prosecuted in the national courts and punished. But what more? The penalty, the fine which may be inflicted upon him, which may be $5,000, becomes a lien on what? On his property? Oh, no; that is not the provision. It is not to become a lien on the property of the culprit, the violator of the law, but it becomes a lien on the property of we know not whom. What property? On the entire ship of which this individual may be on the day in charge as an officer of some grade, a locum tenens, a temporary person authorized to turn the prow into a harbor within three marine miles of the shore; and for the act of that person a lien ensues by operation of law upon the entire vessel. Who owns the vessel? Absentees, a corporation; the State of my honorable friend from Ohio is full of them—steamboat corporations; associations perhaps they are under the laws of Ohio——

Mr. PENDLETON. Partnerships.

Mr. CONKLING. Partnerships, my honorable friend says. There being a line of boats three or ten in number and thirty or three hundred persons owning the stock or owning each his aliquot part as a partner in this property, a lien ensues against the property of all these stockholders. See where it will lead! Here is a vessel plying between State and State on the Mississippi River if you please. She is worth $15,000; three men own her; they are equal partners; each has an interest of $5,000. Some officer of this boat in violation of a State statute somewhere between Minnesota and Louisiana ties her up at a wharf or a snub-post, and a State statute is violated. There descends upon her instantly a lien to the amount of $5,000. She goes on and she is tied up at another wharf in some other State in violation of some State regulation. Another lien of $5,000 follows. And when she has been tied up a third time the lien would exhaust the entire property, and the three partners who the day before she was tied up had $15,000 of property together, the day after she was thus three times tied up would not have fifteen sous-marquees.

Is not that a very extraordinary proceeding? And it is to be enforced "by any of the provisions known to the revenue laws." Among those provisions are qui tam actions. An informer hears that somebody has violated the sovereignty of the State of Connecticut by tying a boat up at one of her piers in violation of some statute, and thereupon he goes to the United States district attorney, who this bill says shall appear—it is very mandatory upon him—gives information to the district attorney, and the informant has his right to moiety or advantage, and a prosecution must go on, and that although no owner of the vessel has himself been guilty of the slightest infraction of the law or the slightest impropriety; although he is away where he lives, hundreds of miles off; he has employed proper agents, discreet and competent men to manage his vessel, or he has chartered his vessel to some one who is running her on his own account, the owner of the vessel having no interest in her except the money he receives for her charter and the ultimate ownership of the boat; and yet because one, not even his agent, violates the statute of a State, under national authority for that violation his property is confiscated!

Mr. President, there are other provisions in this bill which, if it were worth while, might be pointed out, showing, some of them, as I respectfully suggest, its incongruity, and others showing the inherent, the insurmountable difficulty of attempting to do by one cast-iron regulation stretching from sea to sea over our whole jurisdiction, that which should be done in spots and places by the local authority understanding the need and adapting the remedy to the case to be cured. I shall not proceed, however, to do it. I rose chiefly for the purpose of assigning very briefly some of the reasons which will constrain me to vote against this last endeavor, made intelligibly and in good faith, I have no doubt, to adapt provisions of the Constitution never designed for such a purpose to the exigency in question.

Could I reach the ears of those who have control in this regard, I would certainly counsel earnestly that they should bethink themselves and bestir themselves, and do that which has been deemed necessary in regions comparatively distant from these threatened visitations—that they should appeal to the powers adequate and appropriate to the purpose, and that they should not sit down either in discouragement or in indifference and trust to the golden promise of some shadowy by-and-by, to some plan to be discovered by somebody under which national authority may go into every neighborhood, on every river, at every seaport, and there wash and cleanse and police and deal with the local circumstances there found.

But I have no idea that anything that I have said or anything that I could say would answer any purpose valuable beyond making such excuse as I may need for the vote I shall feel compelled to give, glad and ready as I should be to vote for any measure which seemed to me at once admissible under the Constitution and well directed at the object.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, a single word. Relying upon State quarantine regulations, without the power to supplement them, where insufficient, without the power to establish them where they did not exist, within the history of this country, not a very extended one, we have had eighty-eight epidemics of a single disease—yellow fever—which have scourged the country as few countries have been scourged in the history of the world by disease. The philosophy of the argument of the honorable Senator from New York is that we shall still rely upon that system which has been in operation from the beginning of our Government down to this day, notwithstanding the fearful consequences which have resulted from that system heretofore. It is believed that a well-regulated quarantine established at such ports and places as may be found necessary, while it may not give positive and absolute security, is capable of preventing the importation of disease and preventing the spread of disease from one State to another to a very large extent.

The question between the honorable Senator from New York and myself is, shall we, as he insists, still rely upon a system that we have tried throughout the whole history of our country when we are conscious of the great evils that have resulted, or rather that have not been presented by that system, when there is a possibility by our action of preventing these scourges with which the country has suffered so seriously and so frequently? I say adopt every possible means to arrest so great an evil. As to that other evil to which the honorable Senator devoted the greater part of his argument, the evil consequences that are to result to the owners of vessels, and the grave blunder that this committee has committed in making it unlawful for a vessel from any port to enter a port of the United States in violation of the quarantine laws of a State, if it be a blunder in us to have incorporated such provision into this bill, the Congress of 1799 and the Congress of 1878 made the same blunder, for the acts of these dates upon the subject of quarantine recognize, as this bill does, the State quarantine laws; each of them in express terms makes it unlawful for a vessel to enter any port of the United States in violation of the regulations of said State. They do not prescribe the precise remedy by which this violation of law is to be punished; they do not prescribe the precise jurisdiction in which it is to be punished; but they do declare it unlawful for the vessel to perform the act.

Mr. CONKLING. Would it be offensive to the Senator for me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HARRIS. By no means.

Mr. CONKLING. I heard the Senator make that observation earlier in the day, and I wish it had occurred to me while on my feet. As he indulges me, I wish to make two observations upon it. In the first place, as the Senator well says, neither the act of 1799 nor any act of which I ever heard (unless this bill is for that purpose to be deemed an act) undertook to visit national punishment upon the violation of a State statute. I will come in one moment, and I will occupy but a moment, to the reason which I suppose led to the enactment; but first, no punishment is inflicted. The distinction between the two cases is this: take a statute of Connecticut which visits with a fine of $20 the doing of a certain act in violation of her health laws. It is not made a lien upon any property; the whole of it is a fine of $20. Here comes this statute of the United States and makes the fine $5,000 and makes it a lien upon the property of others. Therefore the distinction is very broad.

But to the immediate point of the Senator. The Senator is well aware that every vessel licensed in the coastwise trade or licensed under the navigation laws has a right to enter the waters of every State. As long ago as the case of Wilson against the Black Bird Creek, a very early case in the Supreme Court, a little sloop of five tons burden undertook to go up the Black Bird Creek. She encountered a dam; she broke the dam; and the question arose between the owner of that sloop and the State of Delaware, because the State of Delaware had authorized the damming of that stream. This little sloop was enrolled as a coastwise vessel, and insisted that she had a right to traverse the stream. As the Senator knows, the bills which have been filed to prostrate bridges, including the bill filed to prostrate the Wheeling bridge, have been filed by the owners of vessels, some of them only canal boats, licensed or enrolled in the coasting trade. Now, in order to put a bridle upon the rights of navigators, the navigation laws under which these bills have been maintained provide that it shall not be lawful for any vessel to enter the waters of a State in contravention of the laws of that State. Why? Because otherwise a trespasser, the owner of a vessel going in violation of the police regulations of a river or harbor, might turn around and file a bill praying an injunction against the bridging of a stream, or praying for an injunction against the maintenance of a dam, or the maintenance of a ferry, or any other thing which had been authorized by the State authority.

So that not for penal purposes, not to punish transgressions of the law, but simply to qualify the right given to every owner of a vessel licensed in the coasting trade, the statute enacted that for a vessel to go upon the Erie Canal, for example, upon the Hudson River, upon the Passaic River, upon the Schuylkill River, in violation of the laws of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, respectively, should be unlawful. That is all there is of it. Is it not right, nor does it hinge at all upon the power or the want of power to which I have been attempting to draw the attention of the honorable Senator? I submit to him not at all. If he will find a statute, an act of Congress, which punishes the infraction of a State statute with fine and imprisonment and which punishes it a second time by a different measure from that inflicted by the State, and then makes the fine a lien upon the property of anybody, and particularly the property of somebody other than the culprit, I will admit that he finds a precedent which travels on all-fours with this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to move that the Senate adjourn. There is nothing else before the Senate, and I think this matter is so important in respect of the good object that there is in view and the difficulties which surround it that it might be well to reflect upon it a little further.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Vermont that if there be no further amendments to be offered I should be very glad that we take the vote this evening on the passage of the bill before adjourning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reason why I move an adjournment is that I wish to look into the bill a little more myself, because I sympathize with the object of it altogether, but I am impressed with the difficulties that have been stated by several Senators, and I thought other Senators might be in the same condition with myself. That was my motive for moving to adjourn, knowing that the bill would not be crowded out to-morrow by anything else as it is the unfinished business and nothing else is pressing. That was why I wished to make the motion; but if the honorable Senator will ask his friends to vote against it of course I cannot venture to make the motion with any hope of success.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont insist on his motion to adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I will make the motion and try the experiment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 24, noes 20; and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 22, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. LEWIS. On page 10 of the RECORD I am recorded as not voting on the motion of Mr. CONGER to reconsider the vote by which the House dispensed with further proceedings under the call. I voted "no." My colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, is also recorded as not voting. He voted "no."

The SPEAKER. The Chair has exercised every caution in reference to the roll-calls. There are three checking copies now kept.

Mr. LEWIS. I know that I voted upon these questions and I am incorrectly reported in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he voted that is conclusive on the Chair.

The SPEAKER. What correction does the gentleman desire to have made in behalf of his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. WILLIAMS requested me to make the statement that he voted "no" on Mr. CONGER'S motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, Mr. WILLIAMS, if present, had better make the statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama. I voted "no" upon that motion.

The Journal of yesterday as corrected was then approved.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the post-route bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would inquire if there is any general legislation in the bill?

Mr. MONEY. None whatever; it simply establishes post-routes.

Mr. WHITE. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The practice has been to omit the reading of like bills upon the assurance of the gentleman who introduces it from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that there is absolutely no general nor private legislation whatever in the bill.

Mr. KENNA. Is the proposition to pass the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MONEY. I want to pass it to-day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I happen to know two or three gentlemen who wish to have additional routes put in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Those gentlemen had better go to the Senate with their amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he give notice that at the next meeting for general business he will report the bill so that gentlemen may send such additional routes as they wish to have included in the bill. He will save us from the necessity of going to the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. I would prefer that the bill lie over.

The SPEAKER. The bill had better not be amended in the House, as it is usual to pass it without reading. All amendments should have the approval of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then, I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he withhold the bill for a day or two, for I happen to know of several gentlemen, who are not now here, who desire to have it amended. Let him give notice now upon what day he will present the bill.

Mr. MONEY. I withdraw the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman please give notice now when he will report it?

Mr. MONEY. I will report it to-morrow.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman had better allow a longer time.

Mr. MONEY Then I will say Saturday.

Mr. WHITE. Will the bill be printed in the mean time?

Mr. MILLS. Bills of this character have never been printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi withdraws the bill, and gives notice that he will introduce it on Saturday next, if there is a session, or on the next regular business day; and gentlemen had better understand that if they want post-routes inserted in the bill they should send them immediately to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask consent to submit a resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. WHITE. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask that it be read for information.

Mr. WHITE. I object to its being read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What objection can there be to allowing members to know what they are asked to vote for?

Mr. WHITE. I do not want it to go into the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let it be read.

Mr. WHITE. No; I do not want it read.

The SPEAKER. There is objection, and the resolution is not before the House.

VESSELS FOR QUARANTINE PURPOSES.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place vessels and hulks at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine or other proper persons at the ports of the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WARNER. I move to dispense with the regular order, with the morning hour.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to dispense with the morning hour, the Chair will submit sundry requests for leave of absence.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ROBESON, after the 1st of June, on account of important business; and

To Mr. MASON, indefinitely, on account of the dangerous illness of his brother.

Mr. DUNNELL. I give notice that after to-day I shall object to granting leave of absence except in case of sickness.

Mr. STONE. And I give notice that from this time on I shall object to granting any leave of absence.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2013) to amend section 14 of "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCALES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to amend sections 3227 and 3228 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the introduction and reference of any bill for the amendment or repeal of any section of the Revised Statutes without the object of the bill being stated.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill has been given; the Chair is not advised what is contained in the body of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has called attention to the matter heretofore, and several members have given notice that they will require the title of the bill to state the subject-matter to which it relates.

Mr. SCALES. The bill relates to a section containing only three or four lines.

Mr. CONGER. But we do not know what it is about.

Mr. SCALES. Let the bill be read.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the introduction of the bill.

Mr. HOUSE. I ask leave to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The title was read as follows: "A bill for the relief of distillers of spirits by the repayment of money expended or deposited by them for the Tice meter with the United States internal-revenue officers."

Mr. WHITE. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WARNER. I move to dispense with the morning hour of to-day.

Mr. CONGER. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, relating as it does to priority of business; but it requires a two-thirds vote, under the rule, to be decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CONGER. I did not understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. It is a question relating to the order of business. The new rule requires a two-thirds vote to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot see how we can afford to neglect to go on with the judiciary bill. [Laughter.]

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. WARNER; and upon a division there were—ayes 105, noes 27.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a quorum voting?

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted, and the Chair will appoint Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, to act as tellers.

Mr. WARNER. If it is not too late, I withdraw the motion to dispense with the morning hour and call for the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Why do you do that? You have carried the motion, and now you withdraw it.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty-eight minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, which is the report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments. The pending question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If it is not too late, I renew the motion to suspend the rules so as to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has begun. The Chair has stated the pending business. The question is on seconding the demand of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] for the previous question on the bill and the amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before any action is taken on this subject I want to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that there is no factious desire to prevent action on the bill. There is, however, a very strong desire to debate it. I have no doubt that the bill could be debated for several days with great advantage in the way of enlightening the House. The bill cannot go forward without debate. There are several gentlemen, good lawyers, who have views and convictions on this subject which they wish to express.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. We have no objection to allowing debate on the bill; but I ask gentlemen to consent to take it out of the morning hour, where we can have debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the proposition to order the previous question is in the teeth of all chance for debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. We will agree to take the bill out of the morning hour and allow full debate upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, as the Chair understands, suggests to the gentleman from Ohio that the bill by consent be taken out of the morning hour so as to allow larger opportunity for debate upon it. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the republican side.]

Mr. CONGER. We can debate the bill just as well in the morning hour. Those who are familiar with the rules know that debate can be had in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. But in the morning hour the debate can proceed only one hour each day, while if the bill be taken out of the morning hour it can be discussed for several hours daily.

Mr. CONGER. But then we look forward with pleasure from the morning hour of one day to another morning hour on the next day. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Do I understand the opposition to submit any proposition whatever? If so, I would like to hear it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has objected to the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] as stated by the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] submit any proposition?

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Maine will submit one, the gentleman from Ohio being occupied at this moment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let us hear the proposition. What is it?

Mr. FRYE. My proposition is that this bill be referred to the Judiciary Committee where it properly belongs.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. For the purpose of killing it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there are two ways in which a bill can be defeated; one by direct action, the other by such a method as that proposed by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I do not believe that any such reflection ought to be made on the Judiciary Committee by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I submit that I have the floor.

Mr. REED. The gentleman has a very wide field for his eloquence; he need not occupy that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to be heard as well as the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will allow a fair opportunity to every gentleman, so as to reach an understanding.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Illinois ought to have a chance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to understand the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] Is it to submit to a vote of the House the question whether the bill shall be referred to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. FRYE. That is the proposition I make.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope that will be done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If that question be put and the reference be voted down, so that the bill remains in the morning hour, will gentlemen on the other side cease filibustering?

Mr. CONGER. Then we remain as we are, with the bill in the morning hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. All we ask is debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Gentlemen on the other side can have debate without limit if they consent to take the bill out of the morning hour; but if they are to continue filibustering if the motion for reference be voted down, then we will not consent to that motion being put.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman uses offensive terms. I call for the regular order if such language is to be indulged in. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to submit the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] to which the Chair has not yet heard, distinctly, any objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object, and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 87, noes 2.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan raises the question that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to reply to a remark of my friend from Ohio——

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I want to submit a proposition.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has used offensive language, and I object to his speaking further.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the House might listen to the statement of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says——

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Virginia has used epithets about this side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I did not mean to use any. I know that my friend from Michigan is always courteous.

Mr. CONGER. Let the gentleman apologize, and I have no objection to his proceeding.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Virginia used offensive words, they should have been taken down, under the provisions of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Ah, but I have the right to object to his speaking.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not recollect using any offensive language. Now, the proposition I have to make is this——

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman take back the offensive language? [Laughter.] If not, I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I did not use any offensive language, and I take back nothing if the gentleman is serious.

Mr. CONGER. I object, unless the gentleman takes back the offensive words. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is time this badinage should stop.

Mr. CONGER. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia desires to make a proposition to the House.

Mr. CONGER. Ah, let him take back the offensive epithets. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] thought this should be debated longer in the morning hour, and I desire his attention. We proposed for the purpose of debate to take it out of the morning hour. That is declined. Now I propose it be open in the morning hour to debate, and I ask the gentleman how many days they desire on the other side for debate; on the condition, however, that after that time they shall allow us to take a vote and not resume dilatory motions and filibustering.

Mr. CONGER. There are those epithets, offensive epithets, Mr. Speaker, [laughter,] and I demand the regular order. I do not blame the gentleman; he cannot help it, perhaps; but I demand the regular order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say to the gentleman from Virginia that persistence in stopping a quorum on this side is for the purpose of securing debate, which the pending motion for the previous question cuts off absolutely.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will it not afford a larger field for debate to take the bill out of the morning hour and allow the debate to go on in the House?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The gentleman from Ohio should know that there are other committees which desire to report in the morning hour, and it is impossible for them to get the opportunity to do so unless we dispose in some way of this bill. Now, if he desires discussion of this bill, and I for one am willing to accord that privilege to that side of the House——

Mr. GARFIELD. That is all that is asked for.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The only way to do that is to take it out of the morning hour, as is proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the gentleman should allow a vote on the reference to the Committee on the Judiciary to test the sense of the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I am in favor of that.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then let us take a vote on it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the gentleman make some definite proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. We do not, however, wish to come to a vote which will cut off debate absolutely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the first step to reach harmony would be to allow the vote to be taken on the motion to refer to the Judiciary Committee, and if that should be voted down then a further arrangement might be made in regard to the debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I cannot consent to that unless gentlemen on the other side consent if the motion to refer is voted down that then we shall proceed to the discussion of the bill on its merits without resorting to any dilatory motions; otherwise, if the motion to refer should be voted down we would be left precisely in the same condition we are in now.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to refer is allowed to be voted on, and it should fail, then by consent some arrangement could be entered into to take this bill out of the morning hour and afford such debate as might be considered reasonable.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have wished to make such arrangement. I have proposed it, but on the other side they will not consent to it; and I cannot consent to anything which will lead to the defeat of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot say now how much time we shall want for debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Name your time and you shall have it, but with the condition that at the end of that time you shall cease all dilatory motions.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot say how many gentlemen wish to debate this bill. For one I want to make a speech upon it, and I know others do, but I do not know how many. It would be unjust on my part to fix the number of hours for debate without knowing how many members desire to speak on the proposition.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Name the days then. We will go by days, and not by hours.

Mr. CONGER. The third Tuesday in January we are willing to agree to. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Regular order!

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It will thus be seen by the House that the opposition to this bill is factious.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has exhausted every effort to reach a compromise.

Mr. FRYE. Let me make a proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. FRYE. I think the principal opposition which is evinced here on this side just now comes from the attempt at this time, at this extra session, to pass upon so important a bill, so far-reaching a bill, as this which touches and affects every corporation——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to debate.

Mr. FRYE. Allow me to say a word.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to debate. If the gentleman has a proposition to make, let him make it.

Mr. FRYE. I am going to make what I regard as a fair and honest proposition; and as introductory to the proposition I want to say——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not want to hear the introduction.

Mr. SAPP. Some others may.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If the gentleman from Illinois thinks he can run this thing, let him run it.

Mr. FRYE. This bill touches every contract, every corporation, every business man in this whole country. It comes from a committee to whom ordinarily such business has not been sent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to the gentleman debating the question instead of submitting his proposition.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Is that the objection of the gentleman from Maine to the bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any further debate. If the proposition is to be submitted, let it be submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks his duty as presiding officer is to endeavor to bring order out of disorder in the conducting of the business of the House, and as auxiliary to that to bring about good feeling instead of bad humor. That was the reason why the Chair has endeavored to allow these statements to be made to see whether the House could not reach harmonious action. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] now objects.

Mr. GARFIELD. My proposition was in the direct line of what the Chair has been endeavoring to bring about. If the House wants to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee a vote to that effect settles this whole controversy. If the vote shows that the House does not want to do that, then we are not only no worse off than we are now, but we are nearer an understanding. One element of misunderstanding is out of the way. That is to say, it will be settled that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and not the Judiciary Committee has charge of the bill. Until that is settled we have an element of uncertainty in our minds all the while.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to be heard now for a few moments.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I also object until the gentleman from Maine has been heard.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is unfair and ungentlemanly, when there has been a speech on the other side, not to allow an answer to be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Maine, having been allowed to make a statement——

Mr. CONGER. I submit to the Chair that the gentleman from Maine was not allowed to make a statement; he was cut off.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair cuts off further discussion on these propositions and will submit the question. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. I will make my proposition without any remark whatever.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] desires to make a proposition which he states he will make without any introductory remarks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any proposition or any debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER.

Mr. COX. Before the House divides allow me to make a suggestion. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York making a proposition?

Several members objected.

Mr. COX. I think this matter can be settled.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York hereafter.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, no 1.

Mr. CONGER. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point that a quorum has not voted. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desired to make some statement to the House.

Mr. COX. I cannot get the gentlemen on our side to agree. I was about, however, to suggest, Mr. Speaker, if I can get the serious attention of gentlemen who are opposed to wasting time, that we take a vote on the reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee, and then, since the only opposition in the morning hour has been for the purpose of obtaining debate, that the bill be taken out of the morning hour with the view of letting other matters in, as my colleague [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] stated. Gentlemen can then take their own time for debate, and the debate can be limited hereafter as the House may choose. Why should not a proposition of that kind be accepted if we are in earnest about transacting our business here and desire to go home? My proposition is that we take a vote on the reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee; and then if the House refuses to refer the bill to that committee that it be taken out of the morning hour and that the debate on it shall proceed at the pleasure of gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWBERRY. What will you do with the silver bill in charge of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER?] That bill is the regular order immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. COX. I presume that the silver bill being the unfinished business will come up for action by the House.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Let us take one step at a time.

Mr. COX. I will say to my young friend from Chicago, [laughter,]——

Mr. NEWBERRY. I will state to my friend, so called from New York, that I am not from Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I have been "so called" from two States. But that does not matter. I want, so long as I am here, to do business seriously. I think if gentlemen on the other side will only give a little attention to this matter they will see how the whole difficulty can be satisfactorily untied. My friend from Ohio and myself have been in many of these troubles, and have unloosed matters properly and harmoniously. Now let us vote upon this motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and then agree in advance——[Loud cries of "No!" "No!" on the republican side of the House.] We cannot trust you then. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. You can as much as we can you.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would like to hear the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, unaccompanied by a speech or reasons why he has been behaving so badly? We want to hear his proposition naked that we may see whether we can accept it or not.

Mr. GARFIELD. You lose nothing by having the bill referred.

Mr. FRYE. My proposition is this, that the gentleman from Virginia ask that the bill be committed to his own committee, with the understanding that it shall not be brought back at this extra session.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Oh, there is the cat in the meal-tub. The gentleman wants to kill the bill, and I do not propose to consent to that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands a proposition to be submitted by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I decline that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not suppose that that proposition would be agreed to; but the Chair desires to know whether the proposition, without further qualification or entanglement, will be allowed; that is, that a vote be taken on the motion to commit to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any further propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that if he has a majority in favor of the passage of the bill he would lose nothing by this proposition, for the same majority would refuse, if consistent, to commit.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The Speaker would see at what a disadvantage that would place the bill, because every gentleman who had business coming up in the morning hour would have to vote against their judgment, and therefore we cannot consent to that proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend does not think that any one would be influenced against his judgment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the proposition of the gentleman from Maine is declined.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 78.

Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I object to this filibustering on the other side of the House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 93, not voting 71; as follows:

So the motion for a call of the House was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. TALBOTT. My colleague, Mr. MCLANE, is paired with my colleague, Mr. URNER.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. COWGILL. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. POEHLER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. POUND.

Mr. SAMFORD. My colleague, Mr. HERNDON, is paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island.

Mr. FORNEY. My colleague, Mr. SHELLEY, is paired with Mr. KETCHAM, of New York.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, is paired with Mr. VOORHIS, of New Jersey.

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with Mr. PRESCOTT, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. COBB. My colleague, Mr. COLERICK, is paired with Mr. BALLOU, of Rhode Island.

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with Mr. HERBERT, of Alabama.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I desire to state that Mr. JORGENSEN, of Virginia, paired with his colleague, Mr. BEALE.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. My colleague, Mr. LAPHAM, is absent on account of sickness in his family, and is paired with Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia. I presume that, if present, he would vote "no."

Mr. BINGHAM. My colleague, Mr. KILLINGER, is paired with Mr. WELLS, of Missouri.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York. If he were here, I would vote "ay."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired for the remainder of the session with Mr. MILES, of Indiana.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll under the order just made; but before the call of the House was completed,

Mr. TALBOTT moved to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. COX. When will this bill again come up?

The SPEAKER. In the morning hour of Saturday next, if the House shall then be in session.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House will resume the consideration of the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, being the bill in relation to coinage certificates, &c.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. On Friday last the quarantine bill was made a special order after the morning hour of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the Journal upon that point.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] will not insist upon that bill now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 56.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if, from any cause, other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of. And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.

Mr. CONGER. The special order of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] was not assigned from day to day, but was made for one day only.

The SPEAKER. The special order for the health bill was for to-day only.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then I would like to ask the House to make it the special order immediately after the conclusion of the silver bill, and let it be taken up then, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. I think the gentleman had better insist upon his special order now, if he wishes to have it considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no power to insist upon it.

Mr. CONGER. He can raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill coming over from yesterday as unfinished business is entitled to preference.

Mr. CONGER. The unfinished business of yesterday properly comes up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that the regular order at this time is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the silver-certificate bill as it is termed, and that its consideration cannot now be interrupted.

Mr. CONGER. The rule which the Chair had read stated that the unfinished business of yesterday should come up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business of yesterday and the special order are both after the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. The rule which has been read says that the unfinished business shall come up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. That is a rule which was adopted prior to the rule adopted at this session, which provides that the morning hour shall not be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote. The Chair is prepared to rule upon that question.

Mr. WARNER. Upon what question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] makes the point of order that according to Rule 56 the unfinished business of yesterday should come up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-day; and the Chair desires to say thereon that on the 9th of April last an amendment was adopted to Rule 51, which was intended to vacate all prior rules conflicting with the terms of the said amendment. This amendment was as follows, to add to Rule 51 the following words:

And the morning hour shall not be dispensed with upon any day for any purpose except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

Prior to that time unfinished business coming over was allowed to come up under the provisions of Rule 56, which reads as follows:

The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if from any cause other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of.

This was adopted March 18, 1860. The effect of this rule had been to bring up the unfinished business contemplated by the rule immediately after the reading of the Journal.

It was clearly the purpose of the House, in the adoption of the amendment to Rule 51, to prevent the cutting off of the morning hour for reports from committees unless by a two-thirds vote the House should assent to such vacation of the morning hour. The words "upon any day for any purpose" are positive and unequivocal terms. The Chair thinks, therefore, that to allow a majority to evade this rule would be contrary to the purpose of the House in the adoption of the amendment cited. Thus to prevent a morning hour for reports from committees at an interlocutory point in the consideration of a bill or at a point of decision on an interlocutory motion would violate the said action of the House. Had the main question been ordered instead of there being a pending demand for the previous question, then the Chair would decide under Rule 132 that the main question must execute itself before entering on the morning hour; but as soon as executed, the morning hour should be at once entered upon, unless, as heretofore, two-thirds should determine to dispense therewith.

In addition to this construction—the proper one in the mind of the present occupant of the Chair—it is also practical in its execution, promotes the public business, and has the merit of a common-sense interpretation of the amendment to Rule 51 alluded to. This construction could under no circumstances involve a longer delay than one hour in resuming the consideration of the unfinished business, while even this delay can be avoided if the House so desire by a two-thirds vote on the motion to dispense with the morning hour.

For the reasons stated the Chair decides that the unfinished business of yesterday comes over and takes its place to-day after the morning hour, and will so continue unless by a vote of two-thirds of the members present the morning hour of any day shall be dispensed with, in which case the unfinished business of the preceding day will come up immediately after the reading of the Journal and the dispensing with the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I am very glad the Chair has made so clear a ruling upon that point. I think it is a correct one and I acquiesce in it entirely. But the point in addition to that, to which I wish to call the attention of the Speaker, was that the House having made a special order for a given day and not from day to day, the only chance to execute that order was on the day for which it was made.

The SPEAKER. That is correct construction.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] had better raise the question of consideration now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] now asks that the quarantine bill reported from the Committee on Epidemic Diseases be made a special order to come up immediately after the bill now under consideration shall be disposed of. The Chair hears no objection to that proposition.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the demand for the previous question upon the first two amendments recommended by the Committee on Coniage, Weights, and Measures, to section 8.

Mr. GARFIELD. This proposition does not cover the section or shut off other amendments?

The SPEAKER. The present demand for the previous question applies only to these two amendments reported by the committee. The Chair will explain. Under the rules there cannot be more than two amendments pending at the same time; but as the Chair is advised there are five amendments pending to this section besides a substitute for the whole section, which would make six propositions in the nature of amendments. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] calls the previous question only on these two amendments, because otherwise the four other amendments would have no opportunity of being voted upon, but would be cut off.

Mr. CONGER. Our objection, as we have already stated, is that there has been no discussion allowed upon these amendments. That was the reason we objected yesterday; it is the reason we object to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that discussion was asked, not upon these two amendments but upon subsequent amendments, which will be reached by disposing of these two. The point where the gentleman can make the issue will come later.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to the eighth section was read as follows:

Before the word "bullion," in line 6, insert the words "gold or silver;" so as to read: "The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion, &c."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was read as follows:

In line 9 of section 8, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "five;" so as to read "issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $5 each," &c.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to suggest to the House that this amendment is incongruous——

Mr. MILLS. Debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order; the previous question is operating.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 81, noes 75.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to explain in this connection that there is another amendment pending which covers the same question——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 100, not voting 67; as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD. There is another amendment of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Yes; there is another amendment of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. WARNER. There is one amendment remaining recommended by the committee, and also an amendment which I have moved, and I do not think any issue will be raised on either of them.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I wish to offer an amendment to be voted on at the proper time.

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question on the amendment of the committee and the one I have offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the amendment of the committee and then the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, on which, as the Chair understands, the gentleman demands the previous question.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, I demand the previous question on those two amendments.

The SPEAKER. Those two amendments, however, had better be read and voted on.

Mr. CONGER. It has been said that the committee amendments should take precedence, and after those amendments have been voted on the section should be opened to further amendment.

The SPEAKER. This would leave it so open to further amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot object. The amendment is already in and pending.

Mr. CONGER. But gentlemen on this side of the House wish to discuss the last amendment of the committee to this pending section.

The SPEAKER. In reference to that matter the gentleman had better speak to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CONGER. I spoke so because the Chair said there had better be a vote on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs first on the amendment of the committee and next on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. Those two amendments are pending and the previous question has been called upon them. The previous question, of course, when seconded, would exclude any further amendment for the present. After those amendments are disposed of, further amendments of course would be in order, and the question of debate would also arise at that time.

Mr. CONGER. The last amendment of the committee is deemed by some on this side important, and we desire to discuss it. It is the last amendment recommended by the committee to this section in reference to these certificates being computed as a part of the lawful reserve of the national banks.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the eighth section the following words: "And may be computed as part of the lawful money-reserve of national banks;" so that it will read:

The certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports, and may be computed as part of the lawful money-reserve of national banks.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I wish to indicate the amendment I propose, which is to strike out all of the section after the word "demand" in line 13.

The SPEAKER. That could come in as a further amendment prior to the section itself being voted on.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the words recommended by the committee are put in, then an amendment to strike them out would not be in order.

The SPEAKER. They might be stricken out in connection with the other words which the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to strike out.

Mr. GARFIELD. After having had words inserted, would it be in order to strike them out?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be in order to strike out the words inserted and more. For instance, the House might want to amend the clause from the word "demand," in the thirteenth line, to the end of the section; and therefore this amendment would be in order. But the House might, after so amending the clause, want to vote it all down, and the Chair thinks it would be competent to do so.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the reading of the other amendment—that which I offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, page 6, after the word "banks," insert the following:

Provided, That gold or silver bullion which shall become the property of the Government by the return of certificates to the Treasury in payment of dues thereto shall be coined and paid out the same as other money.

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question on those two amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not vote on what the previous question is now resting upon?

Mr. WARNER. What I ask is that these two amendments shall be put under the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the procedure of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is to have a vote on every pending amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. As I understand, there is an amendment pending on which the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is exhausted. The previous question was pending on the first two amendments reported by the committee. Those two have been voted on and disposed of, and the previous question is exhausted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought the last amendment at the end of the section was under the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That is the third amendment of the committee, and the gentleman from Ohio desires to call the previous question on that third amendment of the committee and the one he himself offers.

Mr. CLAFLIN. And that is the very one on which I do not wish the previous question to be called, because we wish to debate that. That is a very important amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Ohio to let the amendment recommended by the committee first be disposed of, and then he can test the sense of the House on the other.

Mr. WARNER. I apprehend there will hardly be debate on the other proposition.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman might try whether there would be debate.

Mr. WARNER. I understand my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to suggest that a vote be taken on these two amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no. My suggestion was that we should vote first on the amendment of the committee, and not put the two together.

Mr. WARNER. Very well.

Mr. CONGER. I have stated two or three times that gentlemen wished to debate the last amendment printed at the end of this section.

The SPEAKER. The remedy is to vote down the demand for the previous question. Assent is given to the previous question being called only on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. There is no assent given.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] assents to the previous question being demanded only on the third amendment offered by the committee, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] That is what the Chair stated was assented to by the gentleman from Ohio, not by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow debate on the committee's amendment. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Michigan want?

Mr. CONGER. I know we cannot have more than five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Only five minutes can be occupied by one member, but there may be many speeches of five minutes each.

Mr. CONGER. I do not propose to be limited to any five minutes. I propose we shall have whatever time for debate the rules give us. The House can at any time control the debate.

The SPEAKER. If the debate is opened it would run under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question on the amendment of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] declines, then, to allow debate?

Mr. WARNER. I do if it is to run on indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has his remedy. When the debate has run for a while he can move the previous question.

Mr. CLAFLIN. It was understood we should have debate.

Mr. WARNER. Let it go on, then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is recognized. He is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I call the attention of the House to these words in the eighth section, commencing in line 13:

> And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent. beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury.

The amendment upon which we are asked to vote says that those certificates, which may be 20 per cent. more than the amount of coin or bullion in the Treasury, that those certificates, a part of which have behind them no coin and no bullion in the Treasury to represent them, may be held by the banks as a part of their reserve.

Now, sir, we are providing by this amendment that there may be taken by the national banks these certificates, issued to 20 per cent. beyond the amount of any coin or of any bullion in the Treasury to meet them, and that the national banks may take these as a part of their reservation.

Mr. BUCKNER. Suppose we strike the 20 per cent. out of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Ah, if we had an opportunity to amend the section, and the House would amend it, that would remove the objection.

Mr. BUCKNER. We propose to do that.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is calling the attention of the House, and especially of those gentlemen who are the guardians of the depositors, of those who are opposed to national banks even with the present securities—that I call attention to the fact that we are authorizing the national banks to receive certificates of deposit which are mere fiat certificates, with no money or bullion behind them to make them good.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the existing law as to certificates, is it not?

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no; that is on the gold certificates.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Not on bullion.

A MEMBER. Gold bullion, that is.

Mr. CONGER. This bill provides that silver-coin certificates may be issued to an extent of 20 per cent. beyond any such coin or bullion in the Treasury; and, as if that were not enough, the committee recommend to this House to pass a bill that these fiat certificates, with nothing behind them in the Treasury, either of coin or of bullion, these worthless certificates, may be placed in the national banks and held as a portion of their reserve.

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that if he or any other gentleman will offer an amendment to strike out that provision of the present law in respect to 20 per cent. on the gold certificates, I will accept it.

Mr. CONGER. I am glad to see some returning sense of justice in the gentleman who has charge of this bill, otherwise we would have been compelled to vote that fiat certificates should be placed in the banks as a part of their reserves.

Mr. WARNER. That is the law now.

Mr. CONGER. It is not the law now.

Mr. GARFIELD. It never was.

Mr. SPRINGER. The faith of the Government is behind the certificates as the faith of the Government is behind the bonds, and the faith of the Government will protect them.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman advocate the issuing and allowing the banks to use as a part of their reserve worthless fiat certificates of bullion?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not talking of that. I say that the certificates have the pledge of the Government just as much as the United States bonds have, and are as good paper as the Government ever issued.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to enlarge upon this matter. I know that I speak with some assurance about it. I am one of those who from the beginning voted in favor of coining silver dollars and issuing them to the people and making them a legal tender. Among the first votes ever given in Congress upon that subject I voted with gentlemen who favored that policy, and I have done so ever since, and if this bill be in that direction, if it be free from danger, if there be not provisions inserted in the bill to give the banks the right to make their reserve, not the substantial value which the present law gives, but fiat certificates which may be issued beyond 20 per cent. of the bullion and coin in the Treasury, I am still in favor of preserving the principle of a bimetallic currency, of having silver issued for the wants of the people.

I am still in favor of having the bonds of the Government which are payable in coin payable in either or both coins which were authorized at the time the bonds were issued; but I find that I am antagonized by gentlemen who drive me from all safe moorings on these questions, who insert into the bill here provisions dangerous to the interests of all the people of the United States.

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman will allow me, I will simply say that there is an amendment pending which strikes out this provision and which I have agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire simply to state that it is very unwise to allow part of the reserves required to be kept in the national banks to be in these silver certificates. It is of the utmost importance to those who hold the bills of the banks and to those who deposit in the banks that the reserve of the banks shall consist of legal-tender money. This is a proposition against the interests of the people, not one against the national banks. For this reason I think the amendment proposed by the committee is exceedingly unwise.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I propose to submit a motion to strike out all of this section which permits the issue of certificates for the coin which is retained in the Treasury for the protection of the legal-tender currency. We cannot have resumption permanent if we go to work and issue certificates for the amount of coin in the Treasury and 20 per cent. in addition. If $200,000,000 of certificates are issued, how can we have anything in the Treasury for the protection and redemption of the legal-tender notes? It seems to me such a proposition is very dangerous.

The House, I suppose, understands very well that the old law in regard to issuing certificates and placing them on the market was passed in 1863, when the whole country was in a state of suspension of specie payments, when there were no banks paying out gold and silver, and the Treasury desired very much to retain what little gold it had. Congress therefore permitted the issue of certificates in order to retain in the Treasury the gold that was there, so far as they could, and authorized those certificates to be received in payment of public dues. That was a law made in time of war, under pressing necessity, at a time when there was great danger that the interest on the public debt would not be paid.

Now, to apply such a principle to a time of peace, when we wish to have a sound currency redeemable on demand, it seems to me is wrong in principle and will be vicious in practice. To be sure it may be said that the Secretary of the Treasury will not issue any such certificates. If so, then why place on the statute-book a temptation to issue them? It seems to me that the only sound principle for us to adopt is to take from the statute-book any such provision.

If the public should put silver into the Treasury, and we should issue certificates for that silver, there might be some justice in providing that such certificates should be receivable for public dues. But to issue certificates on coin retained in the Treasury to redeem legal-tender notes, which notes are already issued, is like issuing two sets of certificates for the same coin. It seems to me it must be clear to any man that such a proceeding would be a double issue of certificates, if you call the legal-tender notes certificates, which they are. I therefore propose to strike out all that part of the section which provides for such certificates.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am opposed to the amendment of the committee providing that these certificates shall constitute a part of the bank reserves, although my opposition is not for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] He stated that these certificates were fiat certificates, that there would be nothing behind them. I want to know what there is behind $200,000,000 of the legal-tender paper which is now outstanding? We have only about $140,000,000 in coin in the Treasury available for the payment of legal-tender notes. The difference between that $140,000,000 of coin and the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes now outstanding is fiat money, with nothing behind it to protect it, according to the opinion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman if the Treasury notes pretend to state on their face that there is coin or bullion in the Treasury to meet them.

Mr. SPRINGER. The law says they shall be paid on demand in coin.

Mr. CONGER. These certificates state that the bullion or the coin is in the hands of the Treasurer to redeem them, but the legal-tender notes do not state any such thing.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that, but the law provides that the Government will pay the legal-tender notes on demand in coin.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no.

Mr. SPRINGER. "Will pay the bearer five dollars." That is what is printed on one of the notes, and the resumption act provides that the Government will pay on the 1st day of January, 1879, in coin.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is due now.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, is due now; and the Government promise is out for every dollar of the legal-tender notes. These certificates will be just as good obligations of the Government as are the legal-tender notes of the Government to-day.

Mr. WILBER. Yes, but you propose to put out a double amount.

Mr. SPRINGER. Gentlemen have said that silver is inconvenient to handle, and that therefore it is not fit money to circulate among the people. I want to know where gold has appeared in the circulation of the country since resumption has taken place? Has any gentleman here gold coin in his possession now?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, I have.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has my friend from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who last year held up a ten-dollar note and demanded gold for it, gone to the Treasury and got his gold now that he can have it? I think not. Since he has discovered that he can get his gold, he does not want it, but prefers the "fiat money," the legal-tender notes, which had only 40 per cent. of coin behind them when resumption took place, the other 60 per cent. depending upon the faith of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration affects the business interests of the country so directly and disastrously that I feel unwilling to have a vote taken on it without placing on record my protest against its passage. The debate has taken a wide range, and the discussion has been so able and exhaustive that little remains to be said, and in the brief time allotted me I cannot attempt to examine the bill in detail, or do more than call the attention of the House to what seems to me some of its most objectionable features.

I have always been an advocate of bimetallic money, and believe now that the two metals, gold and silver, must and will be so adjusted in their relative value as to become not only the acknowledged money of the United States but of the world, and form the basis of all paper money in whatever shape it may be issued. The value of all such paper money will be and ought to be measured and determined by its coin basis, and its convertibility at the pleasure of the holder into gold and silver. The United States, being the greatest silver-producing nation in the world, is deeply interested in this movement, and has very properly taken the initiatory steps to accomplish this result. But in dealing with and adjusting this question we cannot ignore the market value of gold and silver in foreign nations, and the coin standards employed by those with whom we are in constant business communication.

The growing demand for the double standard has attracted the attention of the thoughtful men throughout the civilized world, and, as it has been eloquently said on this floor, the older nations are beginning to realize this fact, and the students of political economy, statesmen, and the ablest financiers everywhere are seriously considering how "they may harness both these metals to the monetary car of the world." Time and experience will alone solve this great problem, and wise statesmanship admonishes us as a nation not to move too fast in determining a question of such grave importance.

In the Forty-fifth Congress, when silver was remonetized, the first step was taken in the right direction; but in my judgment we made the mistake of not making the silver dollar equal in value to the gold dollar. This might have been done without loss to the Government, and would probably, so far as this country is concerned, have settled the question. I voted for the bill as the best that could be passed at the time. A sufficient period has not yet elapsed, however, to deters mine with any degree of certainty what change, if any, should be now made, and I believe it unwise to agitate the subject or to pas any new bill at the present session. We are striking in the dark, without reliable information to guide us. I am therefore opposed to any legislation on the question, and particularly opposed to this bill, which I regard as a financial monstrosity the passage of which would unsettle the business of the country, alarm prudent men who have either money or property, and chill the hopes of every honest man who has little or none of either and who relies on his industry, ability, and skill for future success.

Mr. Speaker, what are the reasons, I would ask, that are given by the friends of this measure for pressing its passage at this time? The only one I have heard stated that is even plausible is based on the assumption that the country is in a deplorable condition, that we have not money enough, (although money is begging investment at 4 per cent. interest,) and that this bill increases the volume of money; in other words, inflates the currency and necessarily inflates the price of all kinds of property, and as a result increases the wages of the laboring-man.

This scheme is absurd in theory as it would be ruinous in practice, and if adopted will afford but a temporary relief at best. The reaction that is sure and soon to follow would leave the country in a net times worse condition than a somewhat similar state of things left it in 1872, and from which it has been slowly but surely recovering ever since.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the terrible condition of the country described with so much tender pathos by gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere is true—which I deny—the remedy proposed in behalf of these starving men would be but temporary in its action if at all helpful to them, and their last state would be worse than their first.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, the country has not been in a better condition than now, in all that is real and genuine prosperity, for twenty years, the groans and tears of these self-appointed guardians of the laboring-men to the contrary notwithstanding. I undertake to say that, outside of a few special industries which have been overdone, the whole country is in a healthy condition, and gives promise of growing prosperity, such as will invite capitalists to engage in manufacturing and other branches of industry, greatly enlarge the acreage now under cultivation, utilize the rich soil now lying idle, increase the agricultural production of the country, and afford ample employment for laboring-men everywhere who desire to engage in honest industry.

With a large balance of trade in our favor with foreign nations, with the abundant agricultural productions of the country—the true source of national wealth—the success of our varied manufacturing interests under a wise system of protection, and the sound financial policy of the Government now established, our country is in a prosperous condition and growing better every day, and if it can be relieved from the itinerant financial tinkers that are abroad in the land any man desiring employment would soon be able to find it at fair wages.

The financial policy of the Government is fixed on sound theories, and is now well understood by every man of ordinary intelligence. Resumption has been accomplished without shock to business or serious loss to any one, and the system is so stable and satisfactory that prudent men of all parties will hesitate long before advocating any radical change; certainly not until the subject has been fully considered in all its bearings, and good reasons brought forward for such change. We now have good money, gold, silver, and paper of equal value, and all that the business wants of the country require. The business of the country and the value of property has gradually and almost imperceptibly adjusted itself to the present condition of affairs. Trade, manufactures, and business of all kinds everywhere are improving, and confidence has taken the place of distrust and uncertainty, and a natural and a healthy prosperity pervades the country.

It is true that we have now, have had, and always will have, a few men who overtrade, speculate, run in debt, buy property at too high prices, and fail to find a buyer to take it off their hands—in a word, men who cannot successfully prosecute a private business. These are the men who are not satisfied with the present condition of the finances, and they never will be, and they want to inflate the currency in order that the price of property may be advanced, thus enabling them to shift the load from their own shoulders to that of others, or, with another motive, that of getting money without earning it. Aside from this class of people, who are not numerous, but very noisy, the country is in a state of business health such as we have not enjoyed for many years.

It is now proposed by one set of gentlemen to flood the country with billions of irredeemable greenbacks, and by another set of statesmen it is proposed to add to this flood of greenbacks an unlimited and unascertainable amount of silver dollars, which will benefit no one but speculators, and owners of silver mines and silver bullion. I regard the two schemes taken together as the wildest system of finance that was ever attempted by intelligent men to foist on this or any other country, and if adopted will inaugurate a reckless system of speculation which will practically destroy all legitimate business and weaken the confidence of conservative men everywhere in the substantial prosperity of the country for many years to come.

But, Mr. Speaker, we must meet and dispose of these different schemes as they arise. What we now have to deal with is the silver bill. The pending bill makes such sweeping changes in the present law in allowing the unlimited coinage of silver and issue of silver certificates for bullion as must soon unsettle the present relative relations of gold, silver, and paper. Should it become a law it will drive gold out of circulation, and ultimately out of the country, and will have, I think, a disastrous influence over every branch of business in the nation. I believe it not wise to pass this bill, or to take any definite action upon the subject at this session. Time will show what additional legislation, if any, is needed. The passage of this law would certainly not improve the present condition of things, but would launch us upon a sea of uncertainty, and most assuredly drift us in the wrong direction.

Since the organization of the Government the financial condition of the country has never been so sound and stable as to-day and so universally satisfactory. This silver question will require additional legislation at some future time; but what we now need most is rest from agitation, that the capital of the country may be employed in the various branches of manufacturing industries, developing the resources of the country, and affording work to laboring-men at fair and remunerative wages. What the whole country demands at our hands is, in the language of the gentleman from Michigan, "a gold dollar, a silver dollar, a paper dollar worth one hundred cents, redeemable and interchangeable each with the other at all times, all places, and under all circumstances. And they want, more than all, rest from this constant tinkering of currency;" and he might well have added that the country over all this demands that Congress shall pass the appropriation bills, so necessary to the maintenance of the Government, promptly within the next week, stop doctoring the finances, leave business and trade to adjust themselves, come home and help harvest the rich productions of the soil with which Providence in His wonderful goodness has so bountifully blessed the nation.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not approve at all of this eighth section as it stands, and I shall be loth to be compelled to vote for it. As to the authorization of certificates for gold coin or gold bullion deposited in the Treasury, that was a war measure and adopted no doubt to aid the Secretary of the Treasury in carrying on the operations of the Government in time of war. But as a principle to be incorporated into the legislation of the country at this time in my opinion it is exceedingly vicious and improper. I have an amendment, which will no doubt receive the assent of the House, striking out that provision. But, Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether it is good policy, if we have a law in reference to the deposit of gold or silver bullion, to make such a change in the law as the provisions of this section contemplate. My own opinion is that if we authorize bullion to be deposited in the Treasury and certificates to be issued therefor for circulation (that is the object of this provision and I think it good policy under proper restrictions) the bullion ought to be deposited and the certificates issued at the branch mints. The owner of bullion in Colorado or Nevada should be allowed to deposit the bullion at the nearest mint and there get his certificate; he should not be required to send the bullion to New York or Philadelphia to be deposited. I am therefore not at all inclined to favor the provisions of the section as they now stand. Certainly I would not authorize the banks to use these certificates as a reserve to secure their circulation. I have an amendment which, if the House should agree to it, would obviate my objection; but as the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to move to strike out all that part of the section to which there could be objection by anybody, and as that amendment will come up first, I hope the House will agree to it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of a bill which allows a currency which is to be received for customs duties and is to be payable for interest on the public debt, but which still is not good enough to answer as the reserve of a national bank?

Mr. BUCKNER. Well, sir, I am not at all in favor of this provision as to the payment of interest on the public debt in these certificates. As the provision now stands it is only permissive; it is not obligatory on the Government at all. The Secretary of the Treasury is not required to use these certificates in that way; but for fear of any trouble on that score, in order to avoid any pretense of repudiation, I would, so far as I am concerned, agree to strike out that provision, so that interest on the public debt could only be paid in gold or silver coin if the holder of the bond demands it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is quite impossible to say anything with satisfaction on a bill like this in five minutes; and I can do very little more than express my profound dislike of the whole measure. It seems to be full of crudities and inconsistencies, full of attacks on the national credit. I regretted exceedingly to see the House adopt yesterday the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out without discrimination the standard silver coin belonging to the Government, that may be in the Treasury, the same as gold coin, in liquidation of all kinds of coin obligations of the Government. Now, sir, gold certificates in large quantities are outstanding. The gentleman may perhaps say—I do not know whether he does or not—that his amendment was not intended to include those. But I do not care what the gentleman says; the terms of the amendment which he succeeded in getting the House to adopt require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out "standard silver coin" without discrimination in liquidation of all kinds of coin obligations. The certificate may by its very terms be payable in gold; but no matter, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to violate the terms of the certificate; otherwise the language of the amendment means nothing. It seems to me that the proposition contemplates a direct violation of the engagements of the Government. I enter my protest, though too late perhaps, against that amendment.

Then comes this section 8, which directs the issue of five-dollar certificates based upon silver bullion alone. It is not stated whether these certificates shall be based upon the market value of the bullion or upon its nominal coin value. Nothing on that point is specified in the section. For all that appears, a man depositing his silver bullion and obtaining five-dollar certificates may come back the next day and demand payment of those certificates in gold. There is nothing here requiring that the certificate shall be expressly payable in one species of coin or bullion or in the other. The bill undertakes to make them interchangeable, of equal value. Under this bill we are opening our mints to the deposit of all the spare silver of the world; and any man who holds a five-dollar certificate issued upon a deposit of silver bullion may come forward and demand that it be paid in gold. However ridiculous this may be, you command the Secretary of the Treasury to do it; he has no recourse under this bill.

Then again you require that he shall pay the interest on the public debt in these certificates, which represent indifferently gold or silver bullion. The bullion which they represent may be worth eighty-five cents on the dollar or one hundred cents. Now this seems to my limited comprehension a direct and shameless attack upon the national credit.

But that is not all. There are in existence some bonds which are clearly and undeniably payable in gold, bonds which were issued between February 12, 1873, and February 28, 1878, during which period the gold standard was the only one known to the country. The Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with the statutes, made known to the world that these were gold bonds. Five hundred and eighty-four million dollars of these bonds were negotiated distinctly as gold bonds when there was no other than the gold standard recognized.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not a word, begging your pardon, for having but five minutes I must be abrupt.

And yet we absolutely call on the Secretary of the Treasury here to pay out, without discrimination, gold and silver in payment of it. And he may pay not only gold or silver on that interest, but he may pay out these shinplaster certificates, which are based not even on silver bullion, for they may be issued 20 per cent. in excess of the silver bullion in the Treasury. Then we say in effect that gold interest may be discharged by certificates of silver not in the Treasury! Those are the inconsistencies and the direct repudiation that you are driving at here. [Applause.]

I have been waiting and waiting in vain here to see something of the old-fashioned Thomas-Benton-Andrew-Jackson-hard-money democracy. We are driving on to what is practical repudiation, and that is all there is of it. We are proposing to establish a gigantic national bank in the Treasury, for that is what it is equivalent to, and I should like to know what has become of all of the traditions of the democratic party against a national bank! You propose an issue from the Treasury of five or six or seven hundred millions or more of paper money; some based on coin, some on bullion, some on neither—how much of the latter who shall say? And out of this grand national bank in the Treasury we are to pay coin obligations with paper.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is quite useless, Mr. Speaker, to talk in five minutes on this subject, but I wish to record my hatred and denunciation of the whole scheme. [Applause and cries of "Good!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say one word in regard to the remark of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] who declined to yield to me.

Mr. HAWLEY. I could not in five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not complain. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the law under which the bonds which the gentleman mentioned were issued, the act of July 14, 1870, provides, in terms, that the bonds issued in pursuance of that act shall be payable in coin of the standard value then in existence—in coin of the same weight and fineness as then provided by law—and I challenge him or any other member of this House, or any holder of any of those bonds, to point to a single act or joint resolution of Congress that has ever provided a different contract for the issuing of those bonds.

Mr. CASWELL. Now, will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will.

Mr. CASWELL. Was it not true that the Government sold nearly all those bonds for a premium in greenbacks, and pocketed the difference between the greenbacks and the gold?

Mr. SPRINGER. That may be true, but the law stands on the statute-book, and there can be no contract for the sale of those bonds except the contract in pursuance of which they were authorized to be issued.

Mr. CASWELL. Would it be honorable for the Government to sell a security on a gold basis, enjoy the premium, put it into the Treasury, and then turn around and pay that off in a debased or depreciated currency?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We had a silver basis then, as well as a gold basis.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the gentleman. It is honorable for the Government to carry out its contract, and it is illegal and dishonorable for any officer of the Government to make a different contract from that which the law authorized. [Applause.]

Mr. CASWELL. That silver was any part of the contract is a mere deduction of reasoning, and it is well known we had then only a gold standard.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Secretary of the Treasury had no authority under the law to issue any bond, except the authority that he got out of this statute. I refer to the act of July 14, 1870, the first section of which is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, in a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $200,000,000, coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present [July 14, 1870] standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $300,000,000 of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable at the pleasure of the United States after fifteen years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum; also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $1,000,000,000 of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum; all of which said several classes of bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above-specified conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States. But nothing in this act, or in any other law now in force, shall be construed to authorize any increase whatever of the bonded debt of the United States.

When the Secretary goes beyond that statute for issuing bonds he has no more warrant of law for his action than the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] or the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] would have.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to ask a single question, and that is this: has the Secretary of the Treasury any right to make a contract under a repealed law?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; he has not, because a repealed law is not a law at all, and the Secretary of the Treasury has no right to make a contract unless there is a law authorizing him to make that contract. And the law which authorized the sale of these bonds is the only authority there is under the Government for issuing them, and the holder of the bond takes the statute with him and takes nothing else. The statute is not repealed. If it be repealed, the bonds are illegal and void. The statute provides that the bonds shall be paid in coin of the standard of value then established by law, and that weight and fineness were 25.8 grains of gold to the dollar and 412½ grains troy of silver. There is no other statute, there is no other law for the issue of bonds since 1870, and the holders of the bonds know it well, because at the last session of Congress a concurrent resolution introduced by Stanley Matthews was passed, I believe by two-thirds majority of both Houses, which served a notice on all the holders of those bonds that they were payable in silver of 412½ grains troy to the dollar. But the bondholders did not need that notice. If they will read the face of their bonds they will find that they are payable in coin of the standard value which it had in 1870.

But after that notice was served by the last Congress that there might be no doubt of the intention of the Government a greater amount of bonds have been taken than ever before in the history of this country in the same length of time. The demonetization of silver in 1873 did not affect the act of July 14, 1870, under which the sales of bonds have taken place since the funding act passed. As a legal proposition, I do not see how any lawyer can claim that the Government may not pay those bonds in silver dollars of 412½ grains. As a moral question, I never knew that good morals required a contract to be abrogated, when it was discovered that one or the other of the contracting parties had made or lost by the operation. The demand for gold payments is not only unjust, but it is illegal and extortionate.

Mr. HAYES. I want to say a word in regard to this bill and the section under consideration. I stand here as a friend of our silver dollar of 412½ grains, and whatever I can do by my voice or vote to render that silver dollar popular and put it upon the country, I am willing to do. I am not in favor of flooding the country with any currency except it be something like our gold and silver that has intrinsic value in itself. And I am in favor of increasing the capacity of our mints to such a degree that we can put out in standard silver dollars of 412½ grains at least four millions a month.

But I am not in favor of many provisions of this bill, and especially am I not in favor of some of the provisions of section 8 which is now under consideration. This section says in one of its clauses:

> And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt.

Now, I am decidedly opposed to that clause in this section because I hold it is a direct violation of the contract which this Government made with its creditors when it issued its bonds. I have before me the language of the various acts under which our bonded debt was issued.

In the acts of February 8, July 17, and August 5, 1861, there is nothing said as to what kind of money shall be used for the payment of either principal or interest. But as the only legal-tender in this country known to the Government at that time was gold and silver, it is supposed, and rightly supposed, the Government expected to pay the principal and interest of our bonded debt issued under those acts in gold and silver.

In the act of March 3, 1863, it is expressly stipulated that both the principal and interest of the bonds issued thereunder shall be paid in coin.

The act of March 3, 1864, says that the bonds for which it provides "shall be payable at any period not more than forty years from date in coin."

The act of March 3, 1865, says nothing about the kind of money in which the bonds issued under said act shall be paid.

The act of July 14, 1870, under which we have been issuing bonds for the last few years, 5, 4½, and 4 per cent. bonds, says such bonds shall be "redeemable in coin of the present standard value," and the interest is made "payable semi-annually in such coin."

Now, what is proposed in this bill? It is proposed that we violate the contract that we made when we issued those bonds or provided for their issue and shall pay the interest of such bonds in these certificates, while said certificates are not a legal tender for anything after the Government has them in its possession. I say that being a direct violation of the contract entered into by the Government with the people who took its bonds, it is the grossest repudiation, and this House ought to vote this section down without division.

One more point. There is another objection to this section. It says:

> And the certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports.

Now, why should this Government take in payment for money that is due it, including the duties on imports, these certificates that are not a legal tender and that it cannot possibly pay out?

Now, Mr. Speaker, for these two reasons I oppose this section of the bill, and I hope to see it stricken out by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. STEELE. As I do not understand, and never pretended to understand, the question of finance, though I am entitled to the floor, I yield it to a gentleman who is particularly conversant with all matters of that sort, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. WARNER. I understand the Chair has ruled against the right of one gentleman to yield the floor in this way to another.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York had applied to the Chair for time and the Chair recognized him. The gentleman has not spoken on this subject.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I wish to say to the House and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that on the 2d day of January, 1879, I presented my ten-dollar bill at the United States Treasury and received for it the gold piece which I now hold in my hand and propose to present to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEELE] as a historical relic. [Applause.] And I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that there is no word in any dictionary that I ever saw that fitly expresses the folly and the audacity of himself and the authors of this measure for corrupting and inflating the currency at the present time. It fairly outherods Herod. It implies—I say it deliberately—that a majority of the American people are knaves or fools. Argue with the gentlemen who propose this measure of inflation! As well, sir, argue with a herd of mad bulls bounding to gore their victims to death. [Laughter and applause.]

Sir, I happen to control as executor $7,000 of the 4½ per cent. bonds of the United States Government, for which last year I paid the Government on invitation gold. I knew when I took those bonds that the interest was payable in "coin," but I also knew—and I put it to the conscience and the honor of the gentleman from Illinois—I also knew that the United States Government had never during a hundred years—no, not hardly ever [laughter]—never offered its creditor a dollar in silver in payment of one of its bonds or the interest thereon! In common with all holders of Government bonds I confidently believed that it never would or could offer to pay its interest in a depreciated currency.

Now, sir, if I, having borrowed a good horse of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] returned him a bad mule the next day, he would say that I was a damned scoundrel. [Great laughter.] I do not use the word in a profane sense, but as a pulpit expletive, and I say the United States Government is a scoundrel if it pays me interest in a depreciated currency upon the $7,000 of its bonds which I hold for a widow, and for which I paid in gold. If you pass this bill it amounts to a deliberate swindle. That is a mild way of putting it.

Mr. WEAVER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is swearing like the army in Flanders. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have not sworn a word. Consult the dictionary.

I wish to say, and I am in dead earnest about it, that this bill for issuing these certificates, receivable for all Government dues, is the greatest monstrosity and financial outrage ever proposed by a civilized legislature. There is no shadow of excuse for it. What is it? If it means anything, it permits the issue of new certificates for every dollar of coin now held to redeem the greenbacks; it permits the issue of certificates for every dollar of bullion hereafter deposited and for every dollar of coin and bullion now held or hereafter to be coined to whomsoever brings it to the United States Treasury; and it permits the issue of certificates for 20 per cent. in addition thereto, none of which are legal tender for private debts, but all of which are made receivable for interest upon the public debt. Sir, there is no man in this House who puts his hand to that bill to vote for it that will not repent of the act in dust and ashes, provided he is subject and sensitive to the honest sense of the American people.

I thank the great God who made us all that there is no more chance of this bill becoming a law than there is that this country will be sunk into the bottomless pit of degradation and shame!

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER obtained the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to say a word in answer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. WARNER. I wish to explain, before calling the previous question on this section, that this provision on which the debate is now taking place, providing for certificates to the extent of 20 per cent. beyond the coin or bullion deposited, is a part of the present law, and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in reporting the bill did not change that feature of the law, although I am very free to say for myself that I think it ought to be changed; I do not think that right ought to exist. All that I claim is this, that if, however, certificates for gold may be thus issued, they shall be issued for silver also, and for my part I will accept the proposition to strike out all that provision and prevent the Government from issuing certificates that shall be receivable or be tenders in the payment of debts for either gold or silver. But I resist at every step every encroachment of gold in matters of contract. I am willing myself to strike out this provision in regard to the 20 per cent. and making the certificates receivable for debts, and the repeal of that part of the section striking out those words from "demand" down to "Treasury." I call the previous question.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. WARNER. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine for five minutes.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] tells us that the Secretary of the Treasury can issue no bonds and make no contracts except under the statute which he has quoted, which declares that these bonds shall be payable in coin. At the time when that act was passed the coinage of the country consisted of both gold and silver. On the 18th of February, 1873, unless we have heard a great deal of noise about nothing, the United States deliberately selected gold as the coin of the country, under that act.

A MEMBER. Deliberately.

Mr. REED. Yes, deliberately; I say so in spite of all the talk and thunder that there has been on the subject, because under the lead of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] nothing on this subject could have passed the House without deliberation.

Mr. KELLEY. As the gentleman has alluded to me, I ask him whether he can name a man living or dead who can or has ever given an explanation of the provisions of the law demonetizing the standard dollar?

Mr. REED. Mr. Hewitt, of New York, made a long, careful, and deliberate explanation of it, which I commend to the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. Had Mr. Hewitt any part in the action on the bill?

Mr. REED. I must decline further interruption. I have answered one question. The five-minute rule will not allow more.

Under the provisions of that law $584,290,350 of United States bonds have been issued by the United States, and in response to inquiries the authorities of the United States, as they had a right to say, announced that these were gold-bearing bonds, both principal and interest. Under these circumstances how can any gentleman say that in good faith and propriety we ought to adopt a system which lowers that promise from 15 to 17 per cent.?

Now, I say that the Government not being able to be sued, not having any third person to whom the controversy between the Government and the purchasers of these securities can be referred, is bound to meet the promises not only in accordance with the letter but with the spirit of the law. It is bound to meet its promises to the utmost. It seems to me that under this condition of affairs these bonds are payable in gold coin, and the provisions of this bill amount to nothing more nor less than a repudiation of that promise. I do not put this matter upon any ground of mere morality; I put it upon the ground that it pays for the Government to keep its promise to the utmost. If we shall remonetize silver honestly on a bimetallic basis, we shall then fairly meet all the obligations of the Government. But for us to take advantage of the temporary fall in the price of silver to depreciate our promise to the public creditor to the extent of from 15 to 17 per cent. is, in my judgment, a mistake on the part of the Government of the United States, from a mere money point of view. We have not done it as yet, and I do not believe that we ever shall do it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. SPRINGER addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois on the left [Mr. CANNON] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have been twice misrepresented by gentlemen on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has already spoken upon the pending proposition.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think I shall be able to yield a portion of my time to my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] as I desire to say but a few words.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want but a minute.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I agree with much that has been said in this connection, that such legislation should be had or policy pursued as will tend to equalize silver and gold. I wish further to state that I indorse what my colleague [Mr. MARSH] said the other day, that if the time shall ever come when the ratio between gold and silver is to be changed there will be as much equity in lessening the amount of gold in a dollar as there will be in increasing the amount of silver in a dollar.

I rise now, however, more for the purpose of stating that I indorse what my other colleague from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has said in regard to the act of Congress under which these bonds were issued. That act specially pledged for the payment of these bonds "coin of the then standard." Why was that language employed? So that no succeeding Congress should say that the bonds should be payable in copper and not in gold or in silver; so that no succeeding Congress should come in and cheapen the silver dollar and say that it should contain 200 grains instead of 412½ grains of silver; so that no succeeding Congress should come in and say that the gold dollar instead of containing 25.8 grains should contain only 20 grains.

That is the contract, and any subsequent change of law does not change that contract. I do not want to be foreclosed by sitting here in silence and hearing gentlemen claim that the contract is changed. That is the law of which everybody must take notice and contains the very contract between the United States and every holder of its bonds.

My friend from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] was very eloquent about his seven thousand dollars' worth of bonds. He must be satisfied with just the bond and no more. That we can adjust this matter so as to have both gold and silver equalized by and by, I hope may be true. But the gentleman should recollect that there are other widows and orphans in the country besides his, and equal and exact justice should be done to all.

I do not say this now for the purpose of intimating that we ought not to have an international convention upon the subject, that we ought not to provide if possible for equalizing silver and gold. I believe the time will come, sooner than gentlemen think, when the proportion of silver to gold at 16 to 1 will be the proper proportion, and the silver will be as valuable as the gold, or even more so, as in the past. Gentlemen need not think that they can pick up silver about the streets like rocks. Do not lay that flattering unction to your souls.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] for whom I have the highest regard, says that if he should borrow a horse from me to-day and should propose to-morrow to deliver a mule therefor, I should regard him as the damnedest rascal in the world.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not say that.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, you did not swear at that place. [Laughter.] Well, the gentleman said at least that I would regard him as a knave. Now, that is just exactly what the bondholders of the country are doing. They loaned us greenbacks during the war worth from 40 to 60 per cent. on the dollar, and then came forward in 1869 and wanted coin. They got a bill through Congress to give them coin, when they had only given us greatly depreciated paper. After they got coin, then they got a law passed in 1870 providing for refunding the bonds; and that law provided those bonds should be redeemable in "coin of the present standard value;" so that no subsequent Congress could come in and change the contract.

Now, when we propose to offer those gentlemen the mule that we borrowed of them, they say that we are rascals if we do not give them a horse or something better. [Great laughter.]

Mr. REED. You offer to return the horse now, after he has depreciated in value.

Mr. SPRINGER. We propose to pay them "coin of the present standard value," and no more. And he who asks more is the rascal, and not the people who propose to pay according to the contract.

Mr. WARNER. I now call the previous question on the two amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. What two?

The SPEAKER. On the third amendment of the committee and the amendment moved by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] himself.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the third amendment of the committee.

The third amendment of the committee was, to add to the section the words "and may be computed as part of the lawful money-reserve of national banks;" so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

And the certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports, and may be computed as part of the lawful money-reserve of national banks.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, in charge of the bill, [Mr. WARNER,] will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the eighth section the following:
Provided, That gold or silver bullion which shall become the property of the Government by the return of certificates to the Treasury in payment of dues thereto, shall be coined and paid out the same as other money.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I have made some modifications in my amendment. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the section so as to read:
The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations not less than $5 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand, and certificates representing coin in the Treasury, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited shall be received at par in payment of all dues to the United States, including dues on imports: Provided, That all certificates for gold or silver bullion shall be issued at the market value of such bullion at the city of New York at the time of the deposit: Provided, That gold or silver bullion which shall become the property of the Government by the return of certificates to the Treasury in payment of dues, shall be coined and paid out the same as other money.

Mr. CONGER. Is this treated as an amendment or a substitute?

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment; it retains a large portion of the section, but makes changes in the text.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not a substitute.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, when does my amendment come up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not allow the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] to be shut out, unless it should be through the operation of the previous question, which is a matter under the control of the House, not of the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, what I have to say will be confined to the section as it now stands; I do not propose to go into the general discussion at all. Here is a provision of law adopted in 1863 at a time when the Government was anxious by every means to get into its Treasury some gold. It invited people who had gold bullion or gold coin to deposit it in the Treasury and receive certificates therefor. The object was to strengthen the Government by giving it a coin reserve. The 20 per cent. arrangement was adopted in consequence of the necessities of the Government at a time when we had but a very small outstanding volume of paper money—when we had hardly begun to issue it. Now when we have a vast volume of paper currency that we are compelled to carry, when we have adjusted our whole financial system on the basis of maintaining that volume at par, it is proposed to re-enact this old law of 1863, injecting into it a provision with reference to silver bullion and silver coin, thus introducing into the old law an element of disturbance. Upon these deposits of silver bullion or silver coin, certificates are to be issued—what for? The section does not say whether the certificates to be issued shall be gold certificates or silver certificates or coin certificates; they may be either. The section is utterly and hopelessly indefinite and uncertain. A man goes to the Treasury and makes a deposit of gold, for which he gets a certificate. I do not know whether the certificate specifies that he has deposited gold or coin—probably coin. The next day after the deposit he happens to want money, and the officers of the Treasury propose to give him silver for his gold. The bill does not say whether when a man deposits silver bullion he is to get a certificate entitling him to be paid in dollars containing 412½ grains of silver——

Mr. WARNER. If my colleague will allow me——

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot I know that my colleague has had no chance in this debate; he has not been heard at all. I hope he will not call the previous question very soon, but will take three or four days to explain his financial views.

I say that this provision of the bill is absolutely and hopelessly impracticable. No man can administer it; no man can explain it—not even my brilliant colleague, unless he succeeds better than he has done thus far. If we had no other objection to this section, it is objectionable as being a mixture of the old law with new ideas which have not yet coherence, which are not capable chemically, mechanically, intellectually, or sanely of being mingled in the same section of our statutes. I rather think that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] gives the provision a little more coherence, makes it less utterly bad than it is as printed in the bill. If I were compelled to see one or the other become law, I should certainly, from the mere hope of safety, prefer the amendment now pending. But the only safe thing to be done with this section is to strike it all out. It is not even necessary to the general scope of this bill, except that the bill is now so absurd that it makes it more perfect as a specimen of absurdity to have the section in than to leave it out.

Now, I hope, having gone over the outline of this very remarkable piece of legislation, we will strike out the section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BELFORD. Let me ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, yes.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether under section 254 the Secretary of the Treasury at any time received silver bullion on deposit?

Mr. GARFIELD. He does gold coin.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask whether the Secretary of the Treasury under section 254 has received silver bullion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not that I know of. Certainly the author of this bill does not think so, because he now proposes to authorize the deposit of silver.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I simply wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is as defective as the original bill, for it still allows certificates to be issued for coin in the Treasury. That coin in the Treasury now belonging to the United States is there to protect the legal-tenders, and if you issue certificates for that coin in the Treasury you make a double issue. Gentlemen cannot deny that. It is one of those things which we should not allow. We ought to strike out the provision in the present law authorizing the issue of certificates for gold already in the Treasury, kept there and placed there solely to protect legal-tenders. If we issue certificates for the one hundred and twenty or the one hundred and thirty millions in the Treasury and those certificates be brought back and the gold is paid out, you have no gold or silver here to protect the legal-tenders.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does not my friend understand that any holder of gold or silver coin can deposit it in the Treasury and get certificates? Is not that the law now?

Mr. CLAFLIN. You can issue certificates for gold in the Treasury, but I object to that, and say it is a bad practice. It never should have been there, and nothing but the necessity of war, most urgent and direful, would ever have permitted certificates to be issued for gold in the Treasury, which gold was placed there to protect the legal-tenders.

Mr. BUCKNER. My friend is mistaken as to the silver, as it is a part of the act of 1878 remonetizing the silver dollar. In that authority was given to any holder of $10 of silver and over to deposit it in the Treasury and get a certificate for it. And as to the gold coinage the gentleman is mistaken. That was not a war measure. I admit this part was a war measure; that is, the 20 per cent. in excess; but in reference to silver coin that was not a war measure, as it passed since the war.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Does not the gentleman's amendment permit the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates for gold and the silver in the Treasury?

Mr. WARNER. It does now.

Mr. BUCKNER. It does.

Mr. CLAFLIN. That is what I wish to get out of the law. It is a bad precedent, and I do not wish to extend it. It is bad enough to be so in reference to gold, and we do not wish to have such a bad precedent extended also to silver.

Mr. EWING. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. CLAFLIN. My amendment will come in after the first amendment is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That will be so unless it is cut off by a vote of the House.

Mr. EWING. I wish to amend the amendment as follows:

After the words "shall be issued at" strike out to the end of the amendment and insert "the average market value of such bullion in standard silver dollars in New York and San Francisco for the week preceding such deposit."

Mr. BUCKNER. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to say a word in reference to the criticism made by my colleague against this section of the bill. The part of this bill which he raves against is the exact language of the law now. This bill adds five words to the first part of the section, but does not change at all the language of the law respecting certificates. The language of section 254 of the Revised Statutes, which is retained in this bill, is as follows:

The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand.

Anybody that has common sense must know that a certificate which represents and is a title to a certain weight of a certain kind of bullion cannot entitle the holder to a different weight of a different kind of bullion any more than a warehouse receipt for corn would entitle the holder to demand wheat. What a man deposits, that he is entitled to receive, and nothing more and nothing different. I have said that I think the provision of the law which authorizes the issue of certificates beyond the deposit of coin or bullion ought to be stricken out. The only object of certificates is, first, to utilize for monetary purposes gold and silver bullion without the necessity of first coining it; and, second, to avoid the necessity of handling the metal and to save wear and waste. My colleague talks as though this was something new and dangerous. It is not only the law now, but it is the practice of every country which has a public treasury or bank. When, therefore, my colleague goes off in a rant about the insanity of such a provision, he had better first examine the law and understand himself what he is talking about.

Mr. GARFIELD. Have we not passed an act——

Mr. WARNER. I decline to be interrupted by my colleague. He has refused in every instance to yield to me. No gentleman here probably is more responsible for the ill-considered and vicious legislation of the last fifteen years than he is, and he is the last one who should criticise those who now propose to correct some of these errors.

I demand the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] with the modification made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] which the gentleman from Missouri has accepted.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. BUCKNER'S amendment, as modified, there were—ayes 114, noes 42.

So the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, as modified, was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. WARNER. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado.

The Clerk read Mr. BELFORD'S amendment, as follows:

After the word "States," in line 7, insert the following words:
Or to receive bullion with the superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to call the attention of the House to the sections of the statutes bearing on this subject.

Mr. WARNER rose.

Mr. BELFORD. I do not understand the previous question applies to this amendment. The gentleman from Ohio objects to nearly everything that is offered by a member on this side of the House.

Mr. STONE. The gentleman from Ohio accepts your amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I have stated that I accept it.

Mr. BELFORD. I am somewhat surprised that the gentleman should do so. It is the first thing that has been accepted from this side.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire any time?

Mr. BELFORD. I wanted to explain the amendment that the House might understand it; but if the gentleman from Ohio accepts the amendment it is not necessary that I should do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEDDES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "denominations," in the eighth line, add the following words: "at the discretion of the depositor;" so that as amended it will read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, or to receive bullion, with the superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations, at the discretion of the depositor, of not less than $5, each corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes.

Mr. WARNER. I accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] indicated that he desired to offer an amendment.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I move to strike out all after the word "demand," in the thirteenth line of the eighth section as amended.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question on the section and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILBER. Let the section be reported as it will read if amended on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASWELL. I would suggest that the portion which it is proposed to strike out be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the portion of the section as amended which it is proposed to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And certificates representing coin in the Treasury, together with those issued for bullion deposited, shall be received at par in payment of all dues to the United States, including duties on imports: Provided, That all certificates for gold or silver bullion shall be issued at the average market value of such bullion in standard silver dollars in New York and San Francisco for the week preceding such deposit: Provided, That gold or silver bullion which shall become the property of the Government by the return of certificates to the Treasury in payment of dues thereto shall be coined and paid out the same as other money.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I move also to insert the words which I send to the desk.

Mr. WARNER. The previous question was demanded on the section and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read what the gentleman from Massachusetts sends to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words read and insert the following:

Provided, That all certificates for gold or silver bullion shall be rated at the market value of bullion at the city of New York at the time of the deposit.

Mr. WARNER. I raise the point of order that that is another amendment entirely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause a paragraph in the Manual to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Although it is not in order to strike out by itself what has been inserted, it may be moved to strike out a portion of the original paragraph, comprehending what has been inserted, provided the coherence to be struck out be so substantial as to make this effectively a different proposition.

If it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can, by amendments, before the question is put for striking it out But (contrary to the parliamentary practice) if on the question it be retained, neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert shall be precluded thereby, and a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible. (Rule 46.)

Mr. REAGAN. I would ask if the previous question is called if it does not apply to the existing amendment only? It may be a defect in the rule, and would operate against receiving a motion to insert in place of matter proposed to be stricken out. That difficulty cannot be overcome by offering another amendment after the previous question has been demanded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] did not do that. He only modified his original amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Then it forms a part of the original amendment.

The SPEAKER. It does. The Chair has ruled that once before, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] asked to modify an amendment and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] accepted the amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Then I ask for the previous question upon the section and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. CLAFLIN.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 79, noes 95.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. LOUNSBERY to strike out the section as amended.

Mr. CONGER. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 116, not voting 70; as follows:

Mr. TALBOTT. My colleague, Mr. MCLANE, is paired with Mr. BLAND, of Missouri.

Mr. BICKNELL. My colleague, Mr. MYERS, is paired with Mr. COWGILL. If present, Mr. MYERS would vote "no."

Mr. COOK. I am paired with Mr. POUND, of Wisconsin. If he were here, I would vote "no."

Mr. HENKLE. I am requested to announce that Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio, is paired with Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana. Mr. FINLEY, if here, would vote "no."

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am paired with Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. HOSTETLER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BROWNE. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with Mr. PRESCOTT, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. FORSYTHE. I am paired with Mr. WALTER A. WOOD, of New York. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. LORING, is paired with Mr. HOOKER, of Mississippi.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state that Mr. DWIGHT is paired with Mr. MULDROW, of Mississippi. If present, Mr. DWIGHT would vote "ay." I will further state that Mr. MASON, of New York, is absent by leave of the House on account of the sickness of a member of his family.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the section as amended.

Mr. EWING. I ask consent to have a verbal correction made in the section as amended: to strike out the words "standard silver dollars" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "standard coin of like metal."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have no objection to that; but if it is done I desire to change my vote on the motion to strike out the section.

Mr. WHITE. And I want to change my vote.

Mr. BREWER. I object to any amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I voted for striking out the section because of that clause which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] proposes to modify.

Mr. MARSH. It was because of that that I voted for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CLAFLIN.]

Mr. WHITE. That is the reason which controlled my vote in favor of the motion to strike out. If the modification is made I desire to change my vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to any modification.

Mr. EWING. Then I move to amend by striking out the words "standard silver dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "standard coin of like metal."

Mr. CONGER. Does not the previous question run on the entire section?

The SPEAKER. The last vote was on striking out the entire section, being the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LOUNSBERY.]

Mr. CONGER. Was not the previous question ordered on the section and all amendments thereto?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will refer to the record.

Mr. WHITE. Even if that is so, I trust that unanimous consent will be given to correct what is a clear misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the journal clerk that the previous question was not demanded on the section and amendments. That being the case, then the previous question was exhausted by the vote on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOUNSBERY] to strike out the section.

Mr. CONGER. I am very positive that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] demanded the previous question on the section and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not positive about it, but takes the statement of the journal clerk.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the record be read. I want to see what record is made of the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated the information he has derived from the journal clerk. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] wants to have the record of the reporters. The Chair will send for it.

Mr. STONE. While that is being done, I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 178) to provide for the change of name of the steamboat Alexis.

SILVER CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the record furnished by the reporters.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WARNER. I ask the previous question on the section and amendments.
The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.
The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. CLAFLIN.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it not in order now to move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered on the section and amendments?

Mr. CONGER. Was not that motion to reconsider laid on the table?

Mr. WARNER. I moved to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CLAFLIN.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the motion to reconsider the main question was not laid on the table; but the Chair will direct that the reporters' notes be read, in continuation of the portion already read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 79, noes 95.
So the amendment was not agreed to.
Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.
The question recurred on the motion of Mr. LOUNSBERY to strike out the section as amended.

The SPEAKER. It appears, from what has been read, that the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered was not made.

Mr. WHITE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered on the section and amendments.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the effect of this motion, if adopted, would be to cut off the possibility of amendment.

Mr. CONGER. That is what we want to do.

The SPEAKER proceeded to put the question on the motion of Mr. CONGER.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I make the point of order that the previous question has been partially executed, and that it is now too late to go back.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know that; but the previous question is partly executed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late in making his point. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered on a bill is a privileged motion, the effect of which, if adopted, is to open the bill to debate which may have been closed or to amendments which it may be desired to offer.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the general principle is that when an order has been partially executed it is too late to go back and reconsider.

The SPEAKER. In this case there was no motion to reconsider the vote ordering the main question and to lay that motion on the table, nor vote on pending question. If that motion had been made and adopted the effect would have been to "clinch" the main question, which would have run until its exhaustion.

The result of the vote was then announced—ayes 77, noes 104.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 42 voting in favor thereof; more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. REED. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. REED, there were—ayes 95, noes 94.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers.

Mr. STEVENSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 42 voting in favor thereof; more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 104, not voting 75; as follows:

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present a petition, the substance of which I desire to state. Many years previous to the great Sioux outbreak, in August, 1862, in which more than one thousand of the inhabitants of Minnesota were killed, Chaska or Wa-kin-yan-ta-wa, (His Thunder,) by his daring and bravery in the wars of the Sioux with the Chippewas, had attained the very high position among his people of first or head soldier to the Little Crow, the hereditary chief of the Udewa-kan-toan Sioux, to which he belonged; and in this capacity, with his chief and other head men of his tribe, twice visited Washington and took an active part in making the treaties by which they dispossessed themselves of their lands, their homes, and the graves of their fathers forever, and turned their faces to the setting sun. In August, 1862, the warriors assembled in solemn council, and when they had resolved (for reasons which need not be recapitulated here) to declare war against the whites Wa-kin-yan-ta-wa or Chaska (His Thunder) together with the Little Crow opposed the step. The young braves, however, were determined upon war, and the chief and head men were forced to yield. All then took a solemn vow to spare no whites who might fall into their hands except women and children. On the first day of the outbreak Chaska violated this oath by bravely rescuing the life of a white man, George Spencer, who had fallen desperately wounded, and taking him to a place of safety at the peril of his own life, nursed and cared for him until an opportunity came of restoring him to his friends.

In September, 1862, when the Indians were sorely pressed by our troops under Major-General Henry H. Sibley, Chaska and another, Ta-o-pi by name, conceived and successfully carried out the plan of detaching themselves from the Indians, forming a separate camp and gathering therein nearly three hundred captive women and children. They released these poor prisoners from their terrible captivity and delivered them to the general.

After this surrender Chaska was tried before a military commission and honorably acquitted. Through the jealousy of other Indians he was again charged with murder, tried, and honorably acquitted.

In 1863 he volunteered and accompanied the column of Major-General Sibley operating against the Sioux, and as a scout and guide and in different engagements conducted himself with great bravery, saving the life of George A. Brackett, who, detached from the command, was surrounded by Indians and would undoubtedly have been put to death but for the timely interference of this Indian.

Chaska (Wa-kin-yan-ta-wa) died in the service of the Government, although not an enlisted man, on the evening of August 2, 1863, close to the Missouri River. This Indian, a full blood, was a noble-hearted man and the stanch friend of our race. His wife survives him. Her name in the Dakota tongue is Ta-ti, which means Her Lodge. In the spring of 1865 she was received into the church by Right Rev. H. B. Whipple, bishop of Minnesota. She then took the name of Lucy Shaska.

The memoralists believing that the recognition of the gallant services of her husband by the Government would prove a strong incentive to similar conduct on the part of other Indians, pray that a pension of $8 per month be granted Lucy Shaska, to date from the 2d day of August, 1863, the day upon which the faithful Chaska died.

I ask that the names and designation appended to the petition may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish the whole petition read?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir, only the signatures attached to the petition with their designation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The signatures will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

William Crooks, late colonel Sixth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry and president of the military commission of 1862.

J. V. D. Heard, recorder of the military commission of 1862, before whom over four hundred of the Indians were tried, including the above-named Indian, who was honorably discharged.

Henry H. Sibley, late brevet major-general United States Volunteers, commanding in the field against the hostile Sioux Indians.

George H. Spencer, whose life was saved by Chaska.

J. H. Baker, late colonel Tenth Minnesota Volunteers, and engaged in the field against the Sioux.

H. B. Whipple, bishop of Minnesota.

J. S. Pillsbury, governor of Minnesota.

William R. Marshall, ex-governor of Minnesota and late colonel Seventh Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, this is a subject in which our citizens, and especially the petitioners, take a great interest, and I desire to commend the petition to the very favorable consideration of the Committee on Pensions, and ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 624) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JONAS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of E. H. Wilson be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

TAXES ON CHURCH AND EDUCATIONAL PROPERTY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following preamble and resolution, and ask for its present consideration. I think if Senators will listen to it there will be no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 8th day of May, 1878, the commissioners of the District of Columbia, on the 13th day of the same month, transmitted a report to the Senate on the subject of church property in default of taxes in said District, accompanied by an exhibit thereof in detail; and

Whereas, on the 8th day of January, 1879, said commissioners were directed by a resolution of the Senate "to inform the Senate what churches, colleges, school-houses, and educational institutions have been subjected to assessment and the payment of taxes for general or special improvements since June 17, 1870; and what sums of money, if any, have been received in respect of general and special taxes assessed on churches, colleges, school-houses, and educational institutions since June 17, 1870; and what taxes, if any, have been remitted or refunded in respect of colleges, school-houses, and educational institutions, the amounts so remitted, and the authority under which such remission and repayments have been made;" and

Whereas said commissioners have omitted to respond to said last-mentioned direction: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That said commissioners be directed to report to the Senate, as soon as may be, fully upon the subject of said last-named direction, and to report further what steps have been taken since their report of the 13th of May, 1878, in respect of enforcing the collection of the unpaid taxes therein named, to what extent, and in what cases such collections have been made, and in what cases such collections have not been made, and for what reasons.

Mr. WHYTE. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. HARRIS] is not present. I do not know whether he would desire to have any time to inquire into this matter. It seems to be merely a resolution requiring an answer to a resolution previously passed, and therefore I shall not object. I only want to call attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee is absent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure the chairman of the committee will have no objection to it. If he has, I shall move to reconsider. It appears that for some reason or other, probably by accident, a resolution that the Senate adopted in reference to certain supposed inequalities (complaint being made that some school-houses had paid and others had not, and those that had paid were complaining and wanted relief) information was called for which has not been furnished.

Mr. KERNAN. This is simply a call for further information, as I understand it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly, to ask them to respond to the previous order of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LOUISIANA ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no further routine morning business the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on Privileges and Elections by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation directed by the resolution of the Senate of May 7, 1879, to be made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I find that on the 3d of March, 1879, an act was passed "making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for prior years, and for those heretofore treated as permanent, and for other purposes." One paragraph of that act in the first section is as follows:

That when any duty is imposed upon a committee of the Senate involving expenses which are ordered to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee charged with such duty, the receipt of the chairman of such committee for any sum paid to him or his order out of said contingent fund by the Secretary of the Senate shall be taken and passed by the accounting officers of the Treasury as a full and sufficient voucher.

This resolution is in strict accord with the existing law.

Mr. ROLLINS. Then what is the necessity of it.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF SUBSIDIARY COINS.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments. The amendments will be reported.

The first amendment reported by the committee was in section 3, line 3, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the section read:

That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coins shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10 in full payment of all dues public and private.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the honorable Senator who has the bill in charge what is the object of fixing the amount at $10? I believe the law now fixes $5. Why is not that a proper sum?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is probably aware that up to this time in the history of our Government the subsidiary silver coin of the United States has never been a legal tender for more than $5. In that we have followed the common ratio of other countries. In Great Britain they had it as high as $10; in France and Germany as high as five or a little less than $5. We therefore thought that as the House had increased it unduly and incommodiously for the public, it was better for us to put it at the highest rate known for subsidiary coin in any of the countries with which we have relations. The Senator will observe that the amendment of the committee doubles the rate of legal tender for subsidiary coin over the existing law.

Mr. TELLER. I think the amendment is an improvement on the original bill, but I think if the committee had left it at $5, where it is and where it always has been, it would have been the right thing. I can see no reason why we should raise it. Five dollars is enough.

Mr. BAYARD. It was done in the spirit, I presume, of accommodation and compromise. The House fixed it at $20, and we thought ten was the highest convenience would permit, and in that way the committee reported it. If the Senator desires to have it at five, that would accord with my personal views.

Mr. TELLER. I should like very much to have it at five, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ALLISON. If we strike out the section, then the law will remain as it now is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

Mr. TELLER. If the amendment is agreed to would it then be in order to move to strike out the section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my honorable friend, the chairman of the committee, (though it is not strictly germane to this section, but at the same time it explains the whole thing,) what is precisely the meaning of the words "lawful money" where they occur in the first section and in the second section on the subject of interchange. The statement is:

That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 may, on presentation of the same in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor lawful money of the United States.

What is "lawful money?"

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator asks for my personal opinion on that subject, I would say that it is gold and silver coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want the opinion of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. I am not a believer in any other form of lawful money than money of value; but in this bill we followed the general language of the United States statutes in providing that lawful money should be paid for subsidiary coin in certain multiples, and to make this subsidiary coin a legal tender at the Treasury for lawful money when brought in sums of $20 or multiples thereof. The definition I have given is my own.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the committee's definition? What is the opinion of the committee on that subject?

Mr. BAYARD. I believe the committee as a body will agree that "lawful money" is money of value, gold and silver coin of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The thing that my question was designed to get at is the matter that my honorable friend has stated. Now, I take it that what the body that passed this bill intended to accomplish was to provide for the interchange of the paper money of the United States so called for this subsidiary coin; in other words, to make the Treasury of the United States a kind of clearing-house or bank of deposit and disbursement——

Mr. BAYARD. Of issue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, "of issue;" that is a better phrase; and thereby for the first time in the history of this country we are to enter upon the notion that the Treasury of the United States is to become a great bank of deposit and issue; and the next step will be to provide the same for all the coins of the United States as well as the subsidiary coins.

The old law which the Senator has referred to that provides for this in a degree, was passed at a time when there was, as the Supreme Court decided the last time they tried to decide about it, a lawful paper money; that is to say, as the Supreme Court put it, there had been an enormous emergency of war that under the circumstances justified the United States in raising a forced loan—that was what it amounted to—and putting out their paper in the place of coin, and compelling people to take it. That time went by, and then came the act of 1875, which provided that this forced loan should be paid off, redeemed; and that, in legal effect, as I never heard any lawyer question anywhere, was a redemption that was a redemption, and the end of it certainly so far as it respected any power of the Government to coerce people into taking it afterward as a legal tender for the payment of debts either of the Government or of private individuals. Of course the Government, as to legal tender for its own debts, has the advantage that all governments have, that they can compel the creditor to take that or nothing, because he cannot sue them except in the Court of Claims, and if he does sue them in the Court of Claims and gets judgment then he has got to depend upon the good faith of the Government to pay the judgment, so that he does not really get ahead by the suit.

Now it is a very serious question with me, and I think it ought to be with all of us, inasmuch as this redemption is now going on, as to making a new provision of law which turns the Treasury of the United States into a bank of deposit and issue for all the coins of the United States below a dollar, and which provides for issuing for them, at the pleasure of anybody that calls, the paper promises of the United States whether they have the legal-tender quality attached to them or not. It is a very serious and a broad and important question, because it is not easy to distinguish in principle between an act limited as this is proposed to the subsidiary coins and the next act that will be proposed to follow this upon the same principle, so far as I can understand it, that it shall extend to all the coins. I doubt very much whether it will be useful to the people of the United States to enter upon a scheme of that kind. I doubt greatly whether it will be useful to the credit of the United States, its capacity to raise money hereafter, to the benefit of its administrations, to take that step.

I should be glad if the Senator would allow this bill to go over for a little further reflection (my attention was never called to it before) because I do think it involves a very important and a very broad principle, and that it is something a good deal more than a mere extension from $5 to $10 or $20 of the legal-tender quality of the coin, which is one thing; but in these interchangeable sections, the first and second, it goes altogether beyond the idea upon which the small coins, the nickels, &c., might be turned into scrip and new bills of the United States heretofore. It involves a very different question, as it appears to me, and a much more extensive one; and I think the Senate ought to reflect considerably before it takes a step in what I fear will turn out in the end to be a very wrong direction.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not know what construction the officers of the Treasury or individual members of Congress may put upon the words "lawful money of the United States." The object of this bill, however, is one of public convenience. The subsidiary silver coins, which are by law debased some 6 per cent. below the standard silver coin, the legal-tender silver coin of the country, have been so issued or have been so accepted and used that a glut has been caused in certain retail centers by which great inconvenience and great loss to merchants, retailers and otherwise, have been caused. It was believed as a matter of practical relief that if at the Treasury and at its various branches and agencies the Government could receive this subsidiary coin in sums of not less than $20 and multiples thereof to any amount, they could distribute it with facility. The second section of the bill provides that the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any coins under the provision of this act shall exchange the same in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, for lawful money of the United States, on demand of any holder thereof.

That is all. It becomes, therefore, practically a mere question of Treasury regulation under authority of law, that the subsidiary coins presented in multiples of $20 may be received in exchange for lawful money, whatever that may be, and that those coins again may be issued for the lawful money in the hands of the holder.

What the Supreme Court of the United States, or what any other portion of the judiciary of the country may decide is lawful money is not, I think, a question for Congress to control. We may not restrict their decisions or their interpretations; we only may use words intended to fulfill our own legislative meaning. I have stated to the honorable Senator from Vermont my construction and interpretation of the words "lawful money." I am disposed to believe as a mere matter of opinion, that when the Supreme Court of the United States shall again pass upon that question, they will deny to the Congress of the United States the power, in the absence of great national emergencies, to make anything but value a tender or lawful money, and that they will not permit a money of credit at the will of Congress to be transferred into all and possessed of all the functions of a money of value. But that is a question of judicial interpretation.

The honorable Senator has referred also to the fact that the bill recognizes that the Treasury may become a bank of deposit and of issue and reissue. That I am afraid was in a great degree accomplished by laws now in existence for some time past. That was done by the joint resolution of the last Congress which prevented the retirement of the demand notes of the United States and compelled their reissue by the Secretary of the Treasury; and by the votes upon propositions submitted by me that when the Government had taken up its notes and paid them in lawful money they no longer should be reissuable as a compulsory legal tender for debts, but should be received simply for debts due the United States for everything except duties on imports. It was not the pleasure of the Congress to accede to that proposition; on the contrary it was voted down by a very large majority. Whether it is competent for Congress to change the original definition, the constitutional definition of the words "lawful money" is a matter to be settled hereafter, and the sooner the better. But I do not hold that the present bill would interfere in the least with that, or that it binds the court, or that it authorizes Congress in any way, by the use of words which have had heretofore but one interpretation, and which I hope will have that interpretation settled at some early day.

Therefore it is that I with other members of the Committee on Finance favored the present bill. The demand from almost every quarter to every member I am sure of that committee, and I apprehend to almost every member of the Senate, is that some facility in the shape of a law like the act now proposed shall be given to facilitate the circulation of the subsidiary coin, which is too scant in some places, too abundant in others, and the machinery of the public Treasury can be properly resorted to for the purpose of producing a needed circulation. That was the object of the bill. I hope that the other question as to the proper interpretation of the words "lawful money" will not prevent the Senate from giving its approval to this present measure. I do not think that we are bound in any degree to any interpretation except that which must ultimately be awarded to the words by the proper branch of the Government.

Mr. THURMAN, (Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.) I do not propose, Mr. President, to go into any discussion of the legal-tender law or the legal-tender decision, or into the propriety of enacting any more of such laws. I do not think that these questions arise at all upon this bill. I was not struck with the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, because perhaps I did not fully comprehend their weight. I do not think there can be any doubt about what is meant by "lawful money" in this bill. Whether the legal-tender decision is right or wrong, whether Congress has the power to make greenbacks legal tender, I fancy there can be no difficulty whatsoever in interpreting this statute, and that the words "lawful money" in this statute do include greenbacks, as well as they do gold and silver coin, if indeed they are not intended to be restrictive to greenbacks alone.

Nor am I troubled at all by the idea that weighs so much on the Senator from Vermont that the Government is going into the banking business. The first section of this bill provides that the Government shall redeem subsidiary silver coin in greenbacks, under the term "lawful money." The second section provides that it shall redeem exchange coin for greenbacks. As the Government issues both the coin and the greenbacks, I see no banking business in the Government redeeming either the one or the other or exchanging the one for the other. It is not receiving private deposits; it is not carrying on the business of a deposit bank. I see nothing in that.

But there is a thing in this bill that troubles me and that I wish an explanation from my friend the chairman of the Committee on Finance upon. In the first place I want to ask him what provision now exists, if any, for anything like the redemption of the subsidiary silver coin. My impression is that to the amount of $5 it is redeemable in greenbacks, but I may be mistaken about that. What is the provision on that subject?

Mr. BAYARD. There is no provision as to the redemption. There is a limit as to the legal-tender. There is a provision of the Revised Statutes for the redemption of the copper coins and of the nickel coins.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, but I am speaking of the subsidiary silver coins. Then the law is practically as I supposed it to be. Now, what does this first section propose? It proposes—

That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 may, on presentation of the same in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor lawful money of the United States.

Now, mark it, there is no limit upon the amount. A man with $10,000,000 of the subsidiary silver coins may present them to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York and demand for them legal-tenders, and then the next moment may turn around and demand from the same officer gold for those legal-tenders, and thus exchange as fast as the thing can be done his subsidiary silver coin, which is only a tender for $5, in gold coin that is tender for an unlimited amount, which is more valuable than the subsidiary silver coin.

We hear much complaint that the standard dollar of 412½ grains is less valuable than a gold dollar. Well, here is a subsidiary coin that does not contain 412½ grains to the dollar; that is to say, two half dollars or four quarters or ten dimes do not contain 412½ grains of standard silver, and are consequently less valuable than the standard dollar. They were made light weight on the same principle that the English shilling is light weight, to keep them from going abroad; at least that was the idea upon which originally, I think as far back as 1853, the subsidiary coins were made light because it was said it was necessary to do it in order to keep them at home as the English government does with its shillings. They are, however, less valuable, as I said, two half dollars less valuable than the standard dollar, and four quarters or ten dimes less valuable than the standard dollar. Now, here is a proposition that the men holding the subsidiary coin may present it and get greenbacks for it, and then under the resumption law they can turn right around and demand gold for the greenbacks.

I find that this bill had its chief advocates in the city of New York, and the argument in favor of it was that the subsidiary coins accumulated there in the hands of shopkeepers and others to a very inconvenient extent, and it was mainly for their relief, it was said, that this bill ought to be passed in order that they might get rid of subsidiary silver coins by going down and asking Mr. Hillhouse, the assistant treasurer of the United States, to give them greenbacks for them; and they never said a word about their right to ask him immediately to give gold for the greenbacks.

It looks to me, I must say, as if possibly there was something in this bill that requires to be looked into as if it was mainly for the advantage and benefit of certain persons in great cities in whose hands a large amount of this subsidiary coin accumulates, and who by the machinery of this bill, if it pass, would be enabled to get gold dollars in place of the subsidiary silver coin; and a very handsome speculation it would be.

I may be totally wrong about this, and it may be that with my ignorance of the subject I ought not to have said a word, and I beg that what I have said may be considered as rather in the way of inquiry than of argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is perfectly correct in what he points out.

Mr. FERRY. I am surprised to hear the remarks of the Senator from Ohio. From what I gathered from what has fallen from his lips, it would seem that he favors the proposition of having the people hold this depreciated silver currency. Now, sir, it is well known that this currency in the hands of the people cannot be used to the extent that it is now in circulation, and it necessarily finds its way to the banks and there accumulates. Bankers finding so much accumulating upon their hands are unwilling to receive this subsidiary coin upon deposit, and the result is that it is held in the hands of the people, and they are compelled to dispose of it, at any depreciated price that may be named for it, to parties who may want it more than the people who hold it.

Now, the proposition of this bill is to allow to the amount of $20 and multiples thereof this subsidiary coin to be convertible into greenbacks, and the greenbacks of course are convertible into coin, thus appreciating this subsidiary silver and placing it to the amount of $20 and its multiples upon a par with gold.

If I were framing an original bill I would dispense with this subsidiary coin. In fact it grew out of the necessity of providing for its circulation when silver was at a premium. There is no such condition at the present time; gold is rather at a premium and silver not. I should prefer to place the silver upon the standard value of 412½ grains to the dollar. But we have the subsidiary coin, which was coined in order to protect its circulation, in order to prevent its being shipped abroad, in order to compel its being held within the country in the hands of the people.

Now this proposition coming from the House has as its object to appreciate the value of the subsidiary coin and give the people the same right to deposit it with banks that they have to deposit greenbacks, at least to the amount of $20 and multiples of that sum. I cannot see how the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator can object to a proposition that will appreciate the value of subsidiary silver. I am sorry with him that it bears a depreciation as compared with the standard silver; but we must meet facts as they are. It was issued at a time when in the wisdom of Congress it was deemed best; and under existing circumstances it is now thought best not to redeem the subsidiary silver and then coin it into the standard basis. So long as we have the subsidiary coin we should appreciate its value by legislation; we are doing it by this bill, and I think upon reflection the Senator from Ohio will see that it is appreciating it and will lead the people and the bankers to receive it just as freely as they do the standard silver dollar.

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, this bill is substantially a copy of one I had the honor to introduce at the last session of Congress, and I am surprised to find that there is any serious objection to it. The reason that prompted me to introduce it was this: I knew that subsidiary silver coin was depreciated; first, from the fact that it had been issued in larger volume than the necessities of the country required; and, second, the machinery for its distribution from the points where it was congested to the points where it was wanted was defective. The laboring-man, the man who works by the day, receives his pay for the most part in subsidiary silver coin. When he goes to the retailer to buy his small supplies, the retail merchants knowing very well that he will have to sell this silver at a discount, of course adds the amount of the discount to the price of the articles which he sells. Then he goes to the broker and sells this subsidiary silver, in the large cities, from ½ of 1 per cent. to 3 per cent. discount. That is a continual friction in the machinery of business. By this bill I have no idea that any considerable sum will ever be permanently redeemed, but it will have the effect to bring subsidiary silver coin in all its uses directly to par; and I suppose that if there is any one principle in finance upon which we all agree, it is that the currency of the country should be of uniform value. Whatever it may be, it should be of uniform and equal value in all the operations of business.

The Senator from Vermont suggests that we are establishing a kind of banking business here through which this subsidiary silver is to be redeemed. Why not? It is a token coinage. Whatever of profit there is in it has been made by the Government. The difference between that and par has been made by the Government in the coinage; and it seems to me nothing but common honesty that the Government should be at all times ready to redeem it, and that it is its first duty to keep it at par.

Why, Mr. President, I suppose that this $40,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin as actual money, in passing from hand to hand, not only performs more transactions than all the balance of the currency of the United States, but actually more in amount; and the slightest friction upon that in the aggregate is an immense loss which falls upon the people, and upon the people who are least able to bear it.

The effect of this bill will be that it will fix automatically the volume of subsidiary silver coin in circulation precisely in accordance with the wants of the business of the country; there will be just that amount in circulation, no more and no less, for the moment that there is a scarcity it will be drawn off from the Treasury, and whenever there is a surplus it will find its way into the Treasury.

This bill differs from the one which I had the honor to present in containing the words "lawful money." The bill I drafted was specific; it said "legal-tender notes." It left no room for construction, and I confess that I should prefer those words to the words in the bill, so that there could be no room for construction at all by any officer of the Government. If the people prefer the legal-tender notes in exchange for subsidiary silver coins to the silver dollars, or the gold dollars, as they seem to do, why not let them have them?

The bill I presented was reported at the last session of Congress, and it then went over, if I remember correctly, on the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont that he desired further time to consider it; or perhaps it was the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was not I, I think.

Mr. BOOTH. There have been petitions for this measure from every section of the country. The Senator from Ohio suggests that some one having $10,000,000 of this coin might present it to the Treasury, receive legal-tender notes, and then convert the legal-tender notes into gold. There could be no desire to do that. If a man had received $10,000,000 of this coin, and it was below par, this Government ought to be willing to redeem it; but there need not be the slightest apprehension that any considerable part of this subsidiary silver will find its way into the Treasury of the United States. That excess of volume which now depreciates it is all that will be presented for exchange. It is simply a method of distribution without cost that will at once bring this coin to par in every section of the country.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, a few words in reference to the bill, especially as I receive a great many letters, not from the city of New York, but from the country towns in my State about this subsidiary silver coinage.

A suggestion is made as to the injustice of having the Government receive this coinage, it being intrinsically of less value than other money. The Government issued this subsidiary silver coin receiving for it lawful money, dollar for dollar, every bit of it; we paid it out at par, four quarters for a dollar. It is issued as a coin of convenience for the small trade of the country. We must have coin of a lower denomination than the dollar, suitable to the transactions of the people. Hence I to-day or anybody else will give a gold dollar or a greenback dollar for the four quarters, because I need them for change. The small dealers of the country must have them, and they have to receive them in large quantities. Every government that issues coin should, and does I think, receive it. There is nothing wrong in that. The Government loses nothing by it. The Government issued this subsidiary coin getting par for it, and should now receive it, giving other dollars at par for it, and this particular bill authorizes the Government to reissue it as it is needed for token currency.

A difficulty has arisen in certain parts and with certain people, and they are not banks or bankers, or men of wealth usually; but they are small dealers, the men that go into the country towns to sell their vegetables and butter, and the men who buy those things from them. The latter get a large amount of this small currency. If they take it to the banks the banks will not receive it on deposit, it being a legal tender only for $5; it is redeemable nowhere, and so the small dealers have it on their hands, and I am told they now have to sell it at a discount, which is wrong.

The object of this bill is that where there is too much out a party may bring it to one of the officers of the Government, in sums not less than $20, and get other money for it, greenbacks or gold or silver dollars, as the people may wish in exchange. Thus the small dealer is relieved without loss; and as there is a demand somewhere else, those who need the change, be they bankers or individuals, must pay the Government par for it. I think this is entirely wise and right. It is a mode of distributing this coinage when it is needed; and where there is too much out the Government takes it and holds it until more subsidiary coin is needed, and then it sends it out. There is no loss by this, and it is a convenience to the people, and it relieves the men who have an accumulation of change from the loss they are suffering to-day in every town and in every place where there is a great deal of small traffic. I hope, therefore, this measure of relief, which does not benefit the Government or injure it at all, but which does save a thrifty class of humble dealers from loss, will pass.

Another word. The House of Representatives did pass the bill with a section making this subsidiary coin a legal tender for $20. It is now a legal tender for $5. I think $10 is a just medium. I think if you put it at $20 there will be too much of it put upon the people; the class of people engaged in small dealings will receive all their money in silver change, and they will be inconvenienced by that. I think $10 is a just medium between the five and the twenty, and I think if we pass it in that form the House will acquiesce, and it will be found to work better and essentially do all that is needed in reference to making it a legal tender, not making it too large so as to work injuriously to the men who have to take it having small debts due them.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The morning hour has expired and the Chair will lay before the Senate——

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill which is the regular order will consent to let this bill be considered. It is a very important bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It had better wait until to-morrow, then.

Mr. HARRIS. If the consideration of this bill could be concluded in any reasonably short time, I should have no objection; but knowing as I do that it is a most fruitful source of debate, I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. PADDOCK. It seems to me we ought to be able to pass the bill in half an hour or an hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will not pass it in half an hour, I am almost persuaded.

Mr. HARRIS. I am quite satisfied it will take considerable time, and in view of that fact I insist on the regular order.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will consent to allow this bill to go on and be concluded. The yellow fever has not appeared this year, and this silver question affects the whole people of the United States, and it is more important that it should be disposed of now than the bill which the Senator is pressing the consideration of. That will come in advance of the appearance of the epidemic. I trust he will allow at least an hour for this silver bill. It cannot consume more than that time, and such an important bill ought to be disposed of. The Senator with his bill has occupied a great deal of the time of the Senate. I have patiently and very favorably listened, and I am disposed to support it as I have so far done. I supported the largest amount involved in the bill for the object proposed, because I am in sympathy with it. I am in sympathy with the passage of the bill. At the same time I consider this silver question of more importance at the present time, in the absence of the yellow fever, for the moment it appears will come the Senator's bill or some other to provide against it. Now that this question is up, we ought to give time enough, say an hour, to close it up. I think it can be done within that time.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rose to speak to this bill, but the morning hour had expired, and I could not be heard; yet I see other Senators are heard. I do not understand it exactly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us go on with the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say in answer to the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. HEREFORD. Has the morning hour expired or not? If this matter is to be discussed I believe I have the floor. If it is not, let us go on with the bill of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I had intended to assign a reason why I cannot yield to the request of the Senator from Michigan. I should be glad to do so if I thought the bill could be disposed of in half an hour, but I do not think it can be disposed of in an hour.

Mr. FERRY. Suppose the Senator allows a half hour to be consumed, and test whether the Senate can dispose of the bill within that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order will be before the Senate in about a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us wait that moment then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 108.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to give notice that immediately after this bill is disposed of I desire to call up the bill (S. No. 206) relative to the transportation of animals.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment to the pending bill:

SEC. 10. This act shall not continue in force for a longer period than two years from the date of its approval.

When I first thought of presenting this amendment to the Senate I designed to make the period four years, and I am willing to do so now if the friends of the bill prefer it, but there ought to be some limitation upon the time that this experiment is to run. I think the difficulties we are going to experience hereafter in getting rid of a measure like this, if it shall be desirable to get rid of it, will be such as are very often experienced in getting rid of salaried officers and bureaus. This is an experiment, necessarily so; it is confessed on all hands to be simply an experiment. I am willing to give as large latitude to it as may be necessary in order that the experiment shall be thoroughly tried, and in offering this amendment I am willing to make the change suggested, leaving that to the friends of the measure if they think the time of two years is not long enough.

These are the only remarks I desire to make about it.

Mr. HARRIS. I would prefer that the Senator should modify his amendment to four years, but in asking him to do so I must state to him that, in view of the fact that Congress will be in session once every year and may repeal this act or modify it every year that it is in session, I cannot vote for the Senator's amendment if he were to fix the limit at ten years, because Congress has complete power over the subject and may modify or repeal the act whenever it shall see fit to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course Congress may modify or repeal this act whenever it may see fit to do so; and yet we are perfectly aware of the difficulties that surround a subject of this kind when you undertake to resort to measures of repeal. Private interests grow up around a question of this kind, and they might become in this case of very great magnitude and of very great importance, and we might find ourselves embarrassed even in controversies between different sections of the country; controversies between various seaports; we know not what may arise under the administration of this law which would bring up difficulties that would be very serious and very embarrassing in their consequences. As it is entirely experimental, ought we not to fix a limitation in the bill for its expiration, and if the project commends itself to the public judgment and to the experience of the country, then we can certainly rely on Congress to continue it in force. But surely there is not one point in this case that is not involved in doubt and difficulty. The committee have had this subject under consideration for a long time; they have bestowed upon it great attention, great thought, great research, both in reference to the law which is supposed to govern the case and in reference to the condition of the health of the country and the possibility of preventing the importation of epidemic diseases; and after all their examinations and researches we come here and find ourselves involved in a difficult debate over every feature of this bill.

The truth is that there is nothing connected with this measure that is not experimental, and I would not vote for it at all if I did not feel that I was constrained by a demand of public opinion in my section of country that is overwhelming. Although I think these gentlemen on the committee have done all that can be done to remove the conflict of jurisdiction between the State and Federal governments on this very delicate subject, yet I do not know precisely where the line of division is now made by this bill. Certainly it has become a subject of a good deal of experiment back and forth, and I think it is not wise for the committee to insist that we shall put an iron shoe upon our feet and trust to the chances whether we shall hereafter get rid of it or not on a subject like this. It is better that we should proceed experimentally, that we should proceed tentatively, rather than that we should proceed by mandatory and, so far as this is concerned, irrevocable legislation. I trust, therefore, that the committee will not insist that this project that the committee are not able to guarantee the well-working of shall be taken and made permanent solely upon trust.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MAXEY. I move to strike out the word "two" and insert "four."

Mr. MORGAN. I accept that amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. If we limit it to two years that will not be sufficient to try such a measure, which involves great interests, and I think four years would be a reasonable time.

Mr. MORGAN. I modify the amendment I offered so as to make the time four years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as modified.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 23.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this vote with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 13; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee who has the measure in charge to some language in the first section of the bill. I am only anxious that all doubt should be removed in regard to the meaning of these words:

That it shall be unlawful for any vessel engaged in the transportation of goods or persons from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists, to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act.

I would suggest to the Senator who has the bill in charge, if he thinks proper to adopt it, that the words "merchant ship or vessel" be inserted after the word "any" in place of the words "vessel engaged in the transportation of goods or persons." A great many vessels come into southern ports that carry no goods into those ports; they come light, in ballast, from foreign ports and places, with a view of loading at domestic ports; and they are not engaged in the transportation of persons within the meaning of this law, in my judgment, and would not be so held to be. They come in ballast, and I think I can see great ground of controversy growing out of this language. It would mean, I think, that a vessel must be actually engaged in the transportation of goods or persons to fall within this language; but the words "merchant ship or vessel" would remove the difficulty and relieve it of all doubt. Nearly all the shipping that comes into my port comes in in ballast.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator from Florida in what business those ships that come into his port in ballast are engaged?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. They cannot be said to be engaged in any particular branch of the carrying trade. In the first place, they take out cargoes of merchandise from Great Britain to South America, assorted goods. They take coal to the West Indies. They are chartered abroad, and then they come in ballast from those South American ports and the West Indies to Pensacola for timber. It cannot be said that they are actually engaged in the timber trade, because the voyage is made up of several kinds of cargoes, and when they come into my port in ballast they bring nothing there in the way of goods. They are owned by a contentious class of persons in some cases, and if there is any ground to litigate upon they will be sure to do it. I think the words "merchant ship or vessel" would remove all doubt.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no special objection to inserting the language suggested by the Senator, but it seems to me wholly unnecessary, because the ship that comes to the Senator's port in ballast, coming for a cargo, whether it be of lumber, of coal, of merchandise, no matter of what, is included, I think, in the language as it now stands in the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. But the bill uses the words "engaged in the transportation of goods or persons." I know that according to the broad rules of construction this language might be held to include such vessels as I have indicated; but I have seen enough of these contentions to know that trouble can be made out of the language.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment. I do not think the opinions of the committee are of any consequence in regard to the bill any way, and I am perfectly satisfied to let him amend it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say to the Senator that I am heartily in favor of the bill. My amendment is not offered with a view of injuring the proposition at all.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida offer an amendment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. After the word "any," in line 3 of section 1, I move to strike out "vessel engaged in the transportation of goods or persons," and insert "merchant ship or vessel;" so as to read:

That it shall be unlawful for any merchant ship or vessel from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists, to enter any port of the United States, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the attention of the Senator having charge of the bill to the last section, section 9, which I think repeals more of the law in relation to the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service than is necessary or would be useful. I suggest to him that we strike out after the word "requires," in line 4, down to and including the word "requires," in line 8; so as to read:

That so much of the act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved April 29, 1878, as requires the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service to frame rules and regulations, and to execute said act, and to give notice to Federal and State officers of the approach of infected vessels, and furnish said officers with weekly abstracts of consular sanitary reports, &c.

That will take from the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service the power to frame rules. I think that the Surgeon-General ought to receive these reports and to furnish these officers with weekly abstracts, but ought not on the theory of the bill to frame rules and regulations and to execute the same.

Mr. HARRIS. The only reason why it is proposed to repeal that part of the act of 1878 suggested by the Senator from Vermont is this: this bill requires the consular officers of the United States in foreign ports to make the weekly reports to the National Board of Health which the act of 1878 required should be made to the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service. Now, if it is deemed necessary that consular officers of the United States shall make these weekly reports both to the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service and to the Board of Health, I see no objection; but I cannot think it necessary. This bill provides that the Board of Health shall issue to the Marine Hospital Service, to the custom-house officers, and to the various boards of health and sanitary associations in the United States a weekly abstract of the consular reports as made.

Mr. MORRILL. It strikes me that it is imposing a duty on this new board that will be very inconvenient, and that would be very much better performed by the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service. I do not see why there should be any objection to leaving the section in forbidding the Surgeon-General to frame rules and regulations to execute the law, but I think we might allow these reports to be made as they have heretofore been made.

Mr. HARRIS. If the National Board of Health is to be continued at all, and these sanitary reports are to be made and distributed weekly, it is certainly a duty of the National Board of Health. That Board of Health is in constant correspondence with all the sanitary associations and boards of health throughout the country, and it is proper that this duty should be imposed upon that board whether it remains as a duty of the Marine Hospital Service or not. I do not see any necessity for imposing it upon the Marine Hospital Service. It was only so imposed as an additional duty to the other duties of that service by the act of 1878, and being performed by the National Board of Health, there is certainly no necessity for its double performance by two boards of the Government. For that reason I cannot accept the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I think the bill is better as it is than it will be if so amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I have some serious doubts in regard to the constitutionality of this bill. I am not entirely clear upon the subject. But inasmuch as it has been reported and maintained very earnestly by distinguished lawyers upon the floor of the Senate, I am not disposed to set up my opinion so strongly against them as to vote against the bill upon my doubts. Since the decision of the Supreme Court in 6 Wallace in the New Orleans case, which seemed to recognize that the power in regard to quarantine laws had been left under the Constitution exclusively with the States, I confess my doubts have been that Congress has no right under the regulation of commerce clause to go into the States and interfere with their quarantine regulations. But there is so much in this bill that is good in regard to its action in foreign ports by the appointment of proper officers to protect the commerce of the country before it leaves foreign ports, I feel inclined to vote for the bill. There are, however, some clauses in it which, if they remain, I certainly shall not vote for the bill; and one which I desire to get rid of by offering an amendment is contained between the words "act" and "thereof" inclusive, in the seventh down to the ninth line of the first page of the bill. I propose to strike out all the words between "act" in the seventh line to and including "thereof" in the ninth line of section 1; that is, to strike out these words:

And all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof.

I cannot vote for a bill which puts it in the power of a sanitary association to enact criminal laws for the punishment of citizens of the United States. I see no authority in Congress to delegate its powers, if it has such powers, to a sanitary association, and adopt the regulations of a sanitary association through a board of health as the laws of Congress. Nor do I see the propriety of our authorizing this board to make criminal laws out of the rules or regulations of State boards of health. I cannot vote for the bill unless those words are stricken out. Therefore, I submit to the Senate and to the gentlemen having this bill specially in charge if they think it is best to keep these words in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland offer an amendment?

Mr. WHYTE. I have offered it, and indicated it to the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in section 1, after the word "act" in line 7, to strike out all down to and including the word "thereof" in line 9, as follows:

And all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof.

Mr. KERNAN. Does the Senator from Maryland propose to abrogate the State regulations?

Mr. WHYTE. On the contrary.

Mr. CONKLING. It would abrogate them if the words were stricken out.

Mr. KERNAN. So I say. I think we had better, in accordance with the legislation of the past, recognize the State regulations. "Sanitary associations" perhaps may be going too far; but I object to striking out the rest of the clause recognizing the State regulations, which I think are the most efficacious, and which are made to protect their people.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not understand that. There is another clause in the bill which recognizes the State laws and directs this board to enforce the State laws and to aid the State authorities in the enforcement of those laws, and to aid them in punishing for the violation of the State laws in the State courts.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. What would become of this case; it is not one which I need suppose, because we know it exists: A State has made regulations of quarantine which it deems sufficient. The national board makes additional regulations, whether different or not. A vessel comes into the port of that State, observing all the State regulations, but not observing these additional regulations. Would not the language as left by the amendment of the Senator, denounce as unlawful that neglect? If he will allow me to answer my own question, I say manifestly it would. Why? Because although the vessel has complied with the State regulations, she has not complied with the regulations made by this board; and thus it does override the regulations of the State, I submit to the Senator.

Mr. WHYTE. On the contrary, that is just the very point I desire to make. If the vessel comes in and complies with the State laws it is not liable under the State laws. If it comes in without complying with the United States law it is liable under the United States law. It must therefore conform to both laws, the State law and the United States law, to escape penalty.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, we seem to agree entirely, and we both concur as I understand him now in the suggestion made by my colleague. His suggestion was that where the State regulations exist and have been found efficacious, it would be wise to preserve them. The suggestion of the Senator from Maryland now is that it would be wise to add to those regulations, to ingraft upon them other regulations, we know not what, to be evolved from the discretion of this board, and then it would be wise for Congress in advance to provide for punishing the infraction of these now inchoate and unborn regulations. I humbly submit to the Senator it would not be wise. I humbly submit that in the port of New York, to which the larger number of vessels come, when experience has demonstrated that the present regulations are absolutely efficacious, it would not be wise to change them in any way, and certainly not to change them by committing to a board, not of merchants or ship-managers, but of doctors, the discretion to impose such other conflicting or additional regulations as they please, and then denounce every vessel as unlawful that does not comply with those.

The Senator says that would be wise. With great deference to him, I think it would be unwise. I think in the language of Patrick Henry experience is the lamp by which our feet may be guided, and it would be manifestly unwise to overtop or overthrow regulations which have demonstrated their efficiency, and to do it by regulations which we do not vote upon but which we simply commit to the discretion of a board of doctors the power to invent.

Then the Senator must remember that when this board, assuming that we have power to delegate this power to a board, comes to make these regulations, it must make them subject to that provision of the Constitution which declares that all regulations of commerce applicable to one port must be applicable to all, or to quote it more exactly that no preference must be given to one port over another by regulations to be made. Thus we commit to the discretion of a board of physicians the power to make commercial regulations, applicable not only to the ports where they are called for owing to the absence now of effectual regulations, but applicable to all other ports as well. Thus we are spreading a drag-net of discretion over the whole commerce of the country and over every port and over every channel of commerce external and internal. The Senator says that he thinks that is wise. There we differ. I think it is unwise. I think it is unwise looking to the interests of commerce, and I think it is unwise looking to the one single object which this bill contemplates, to wit, fencing out imported pestilence.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York does not read this language certainly in the way that I read it, and if I have read it incorrectly I should be glad if he would explain it.

Mr. CONKLING. I read it just as you stated its effect a moment ago.

Mr. WHYTE. The language is:

All rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof.

Does that recognize all the existing regulations of the State board of New York?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will go back to the operative word, which is in the preceding line, being the word "except," I answer, yes, because it reads that it shall be unlawful for any vessel "from any foreign port to enter any port of the United States except"—except what? Except she does so "in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health." Now, the Senator proposes to eliminate the words——

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from New York read a little further?

Regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof.

Those are the only New York regulations that are excepted.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me see if I am wrong.

Except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act.

Then comes not a copulative, but a disjunctive conjunction—

Or made in pursuance thereof.

Either one or the other; all the regulations, as the language now stands, extending protection and permission to vessels to come into a port, provided they are regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act. Well, this act does recognize, I admit vaguely but generally, these various State institutions. Now the Senator proposes to strike it out, and when he has stricken it out what does he leave? He leaves only this permission to come in "in accordance with the provisions of this act;" and unless they come in in accordance with these provisions they cannot come in lawfully at all.

Mr. WHYTE. Now I ask my friend, the Senator from New York, whether he supposes under this act the regulations of the State board are protected in New York; whether there is not another section later in the act which authorizes this National Board of Health to report to the President that they do not think those regulations are proper, and whether the President cannot send an officer into the port of New York and take charge of it?

Mr. KERNAN. By looking at the third section my colleague will see that he is entirely right.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree with my colleague, and yet I confess that the Senator from Maryland has proposed a conundrum which I have been trying for a day or two to guess. I do not feel sure, taking all the provisions of this bill together, exactly what it does mean. Dealing with this one section, I think I know what it means, and I think the third section as my colleague suggests strengthens my construction; and yet I am bound to admit that when you take the bill as it stands altogether, exactly what it means in that regard, exactly where it would leave as it stands now this authority, I do not feel assured as I wish I did; but I do feel sure that the words which the Senator from Maryland now proposes to strike out are words in recognition of the authority, whatever it may be, that the bill intended to leave in the State authorities; and if these words do so tend, then if you strike them out you so far impair and abridge the State authority and its recognition here.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] points the remark I make when he asks me what is meant by the words "recognized by this act." I have been trying to find that out. My colleague finds some explanation of it in section 3, and so do I; but still after section 3 I should like to have some Senator state with precision, if he can, what is meant by "recognized by this act." I suppose it means all that vague and general recognition which comes from the fact that the act discloses a knowledge on the part of Congress that such things exist and does not proceed in so many words to overthrow them. I think that must be what "recognized by this act" means. That is very nebulous and foggy in my estimation; and I say that, I beg to repeat, without the slightest disrespect to the committee, because at all times I bear in mind the exceedingly perplexing, difficult task the committee has had, the task of doing something which I think little short of a miracle; that is, applying the commercial clause of the Constitution to the whole country for this purpose, without doing as much harm in one place as they seek to do good in another. That is the trouble about it. That is not the fault of the committee, and I humbly submit it is not the fault of the Constitution or its framers, because when they made a clause of the Constitution to regulate commerce they were not making a clause to enable Louisiana or New Orleans to establish a quarantine ground to shut out yellow fever. If they had been providing for that, they no doubt would have employed words adequate to that purpose; but they were dealing with national commerce, and therefore in two clauses they gave in one power to regulate commerce, and in another protected all the States against partiality, against inequality of provision, and declared that no preference should be given to one port over another by commercial regulation. The committee finds itself imprisoned by these provisions, and it has done as well as it could do, and I aim no criticism at its work which the committee had the power to avoid. I have only ventured to comment upon the predicament in which the committee found itself past its own power under the restriction of the Constitution, and I say that, aiming at the most laudable object, seeking to do a thing which every member of the Senate is as earnestly anxious to do as any other member can be, we are dealing with powers inapplicable to the purpose, and I am afraid that in the hope of benefiting portions of the country subject to these pestilential visitations we are going to subject the whole commerce of the country to the pragmatic ideas of gentlemen whom I wish to speak of with respect, and whom I treat with no disrespect when I say that commercial questions, the management of ships, and dealing with the various things which my friend from New Jersey opposite me [Mr. MCPHERSON] understands so much better than I do, they are not as familiar with such a task as men practically educated otherwise might be, eminent as no doubt they are in their profession, which is not the profession learned in these topics.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see how the third section can be construed except as an entire abrogation and overthrow of all State quarantine regulations whatever when the authority given by the third section is exercised. What does the bill go on to say? After the provisions of the first section which, so far as that goes, provide for the rules and regulations of State boards of health being enforced by the United States authority, the bill in the third section goes on to declare:

> And that such ports and places * * * as have no quarantine regulations * * * and at such ports and places * * * where quarantine regulations exist * * * which in the opinion of the National Board of Health are not sufficient.

In that case what is to be done? Having obtained the authority from the President, the Board of Health is to make—

> Such rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States from foreign countries or into one State from another.

They are to do what is necessary to enact all the necessary regulation in the premises; and their regulations, if they have any authority at all, will have of course the authority of legislation by the United States upon that subject. Then the United States by its proper authority will have determined what are the necessary regulations; and that being the case, it must be the well-settled constitutional law upon the subject that such an exercise of United States authority is exclusive and not concurrent. I do not see how it can be claimed by any lawyer that when the authority given in the third section has once been executed there is any valid State quarantine regulation left coming from State authority. Can the Senator from Tennessee point to another case of a constitutional exercise of the authority of the United States over any subject where the United States has the power to legislate to make rules and regulations for the government of the conduct of the citizen or the person within its jurisdiction where, when the supreme authority has said this is the necessary regulation upon that subject, there is any State law left in force?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the question seems to be whether the first section abrogates the State laws or recognizes them in the sixth and seventh lines. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland is a little too broad. If the Senator would strike out, commencing at the word "recognized," in the eighth line, to the word "thereof," in line 11, I think there would be some reason for doing so. The section provides that vessels shall not—

> Enter any port of the United States, except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof.

I do not understand whether we are to mean by that that the State regulations are recognized or whether such of them as are recognized shall be enforced. I think the words "recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof" ought to go out and there ought to be other words inserted to show that it is the intention not to abrogate the State laws, for, as the Senator from Massachusetts said, the third section provides directly for the supremacy of the regulations adopted by this board. The National Board of Health shall co-operate with the State authorities and so far as it lawfully may shall aid them. So far as the State regulations do not come in conflict with the regulations laid down by the Board of Health they may aid them; but when they come in conflict with them they give way to the regulations made by the Board of Health. It does seem that the committee ought to be able, if such is the purpose of the committee, to show that nothing in this act shall abrogate or weaken or destroy in any way the State regulations or regulations made by any sanitary association in pursuance of a State law. That ought to be stated in the bill so that there can be no question about it at all.

Mr. PADDOCK. Does the Senator assume that the State quarantine regulations would be abrogated by the enforcement of this act where they do exist and where they are efficient?

Mr. TELLER. I do not assume very much about it, for I cannot find out.

Mr. PADDOCK. Do I understand the Senator to assume so much as that?

Mr. TELLER. I judge that the State regulations will be subverted by this act; but it may be that I am wrong.

Mr. PADDOCK. It strikes me that the fundamental theory of the bill all the way through is that where there are efficient quarantine regulations by State law this proposed act will be wholly inoperative and cannot be enforced. As I understand the bill, it proceeds upon the theory that where, under State law, there is an efficient quarantine and the regulations are satisfactory, it is not possible for the United States authority to intervene at all. I would suggest to the Senator from Maryland that if in place of the word "and" in the seventh line there should be inserted the disjunctive conjunction "or," it might accommodate the difference between him and the Senator from New York. It would then read, "or all rules and regulations of State boards of health," &c.

As I understand the bill, it is only designed to give authority to the National Government to intervene where a State is powerless to enforce quarantine regulations or neglects to do it efficiently, as was the case in Louisiana last year, to which cause is traceable directly all the troubles and all the devastations of yellow fever in 1878. Only in such a case as that is it contemplated by the bill that the national authority shall intervene at all. Taking the whole bill together and taking that theory as the fundamental underlying theory of the whole bill, I do not see how any other interpretation can be put upon it.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that a committee charged with the presentation of a bill of this kind ought to be able to draft it so that it can be understood by even common people like ourselves. The committee do not seem to know its meaning. They say that the general tenor of the bill seems to be in such a way. Why not put it then in direct words; why not say so in appropriate language?

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator is able to suggest more intelligible phraseology the committee I have no doubt will be glad to have him do it.

Mr. TELLER. I was not charged with the preparation of the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I was absent when the bill was considered in committee; but I am satisfied that the theory of the bill is as I have stated and that that is apparent in every line and section of the bill. The whole bill must be predicated upon that theory.

Mr. HOAR. I will venture to move, in the twenty-second line of the third section, to insert the word "additional" before "rules and regulations."

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is still pending.

Mr. HOAR. This can be pending also.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well; then I have no objection to the Senator's suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays upon that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the vote is taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, I will move to strike out in line 8 of section 1, which is a part of the section that the Senator from Maryland proposes to strike out, the words "or sanitary associations."

Mr. CONKLING. Will not the Senator strike out also the words "recognized by this act?"

Mr. HARRIS. No, I do not think it would be proper to do that; but I was looking for a place to insert the more distinct language "which are recognized by this act." If there is any doubt about the fact that the quarantine regulations of the State are recognized by this act, as that is the intent of the bill, I am willing to state that as distinctly and as emphatically as language can.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will allow me, I submit to him that his now proposed language "which are recognized by this act" would not effectuate his purpose. That would not be a substantive allegation. He should use the words "and the same are hereby recognized," or something of that sort.

Mr. HARRIS. The idea had just occurred to me suggested by the remarks of the Senator from Colorado, and at the moment that I got up to propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from Maryland I was looking for the proper place to insert language that would make that idea so distinct as that there would be no doubt about the fact that the quarantine rules and regulations of the State associations or boards were recognized.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Tennessee will give me his attention for one moment I think he will agree with me when I repeat the suggestion I made just now, namely, that striking out the words "recognized by this act" will more effectually answer his purpose. Let it read, "And all rules and regulations of State boards of health," discarding the words "or sanitary associations," if the Senator wishes. If the Senator strikes out the words "recognized by this act" I think he will see on a moment's reflection that he will effectuate his present purpose.

Mr. EATON. And strike out the words following, "or made in pursuance thereof."

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, and the words "or made in pursuance thereof," so as to read:

Except in accordance with the provisions of this act and all rules and regulations of State boards of health.

If you drop the words "or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof," why do you not have remaining the exact meaning which the Senator from Tennessee now avows?

Mr. HARRIS. I am inclined to think that the suggestion of the Senator from New York does accomplish the object that I suggested, and I will extend the amendment so as to strike out the seven words "or sanitary associations recognized by this act."

Mr. KERNAN. And also the words "or made in pursuance thereof."

Mr. HARRIS. No, because the third section provides for the making of certain rules and regulations.

Mr. CONKLING. That certainly is better. It will then, I submit, mean all that the Senator from Tennessee now intends it to mean.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill would then read:

And all rules and regulations of State boards of health or made in pursuance thereof.

I will also substitute for the word "thereof" the words "of this act."

Mr. BLAINE. Why not strike out the words "or made in pursuance thereof?"

Mr. TELLER. They ought to go out.

Mr. CONKLING. You do not want that.

Mr. HARRIS. It will be necessary to retain those words, modified as I have suggested.

Mr. TELLER. All of the eighth line ought to go out and the words "pursuance thereof" in the ninth line.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator from Tennessee would reflect a moment on the proposition to strike out those last words before he rejects it, for I think if he will he will agree that the clause answers his purpose without those words. This is now a prohibitory provision; it is not one giving power.

Mr. HARRIS. The third section gives power to the Board of Health to make rules and regulations where no rules and regulations exist.

Mr. CONKLING. That my friend has given in another part of the bill. This is merely prohibitory and it excepts from the prohibition vessels which enter according to the rules made by the States. Later on in the bill the Senator gives authority to the National Board to make rules and to enforce and assert those rules. But I beg the Senator to reflect if I am not right in the statement that in this prohibitory, restrictive provision, he simply at this moment wants to grant indulgence to vessels that come in under existing regulations of the States. He does not at this moment want to punish, but later on he provides for additional rules and he deals with those where he provides for them; but here I submit to him he does not need these words at all.

Mr. KERNAN. If the Senator from Tennessee will allow me just one moment, I will suggest to him that he strike out so as to leave in the words:

That it shall be unlawful for any merchant ship or vessel, from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists, to enter any port of the United States, except in accordance with the provisions of this act—

That covers all the rules that are provided in the third section—and all rules and regulations of State boards of health.

Strike out the rest, and the Senator will have what he wants.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. KERNAN. The language would then be in accordance with the rules provided in the third section.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, to leave in the words "or made in pursuance of this act" cannot injuriously affect the section. It may repeat or assert what is accomplished in the third section.

Mr. KERNAN. It will mean the same thing to strike out those words.

Mr. HARRIS. But I prefer to leave those words in; and my amendment would then make that part of the first section read in this way:

That it shall be unlawful for any merchant ship or vessel, &c., to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act.

Mr. PADDOCK. Would it not be better to use the disjunctive conjunction "or" instead of the copulative "and" before "rules," so as to read "or all rules," so that in the event of the State rules and regulations obtaining it would relate to those particularly?

Mr. HARRIS. My motion is to strike out the words "or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof" and to insert "or the rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act."

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear that part of the section read as it would then read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment as now offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in line 8 of section 1, after the word "health," to strike out the words "or sanitary associations recognized by this act or made in pursuance thereof" and insert "or rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act;" so as to read:

Except in accordance with the provisions of this act and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee takes precedence of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know that one vote is of much importance to the majority as it has been manifested in the previous votes on amendments to this bill. Nevertheless I should like to vote for the bill if it can be made agreeable to my views. I cannot vote for it if it makes it an offense against the laws of the United States to violate the laws of a State in these general words. I have no objection to voting for a portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, that part of it which makes certain offenses which are now State offenses, offenses against the laws of the United States, but I shall not agree in a law to say that a man shall be punished in a Federal court for the violation of an act which is denounced by State law.

Mr. LAMAR. I would ask the Senator from Maryland if it is not at this very time unlawful for a vessel to enter any port against the quarantine or health laws of the particular State?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, Congress has recognized the State laws and enforced them, but not by penalties to be recovered in the courts of the United States. I am willing that Congress shall come to the aid of the State laws by sending medical officers abroad to inspect ships before they leave foreign ports or come into our State ports. I am perfectly willing to lend the aid, the great aid, of the United States to enforce the quarantine regulations of the States. I am ready to do that as far as it can go; but I am not willing to vote for a bill which punishes in a United States court an offense denounced by a State law. That is my trouble. I do not believe in commingling offenses against the State and punishing them in the United States courts with offenses against the United States and punishing them in the State courts. Offenses against the States should be punished in the State courts; offenses against the United States should be punished in the United States courts. You can punish a man for counterfeiting; there is a double offense.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] complained yesterday of punishing a man in a United States court for an assault and battery committed against the laws of the State, and yet he will vote to-day to punish a man in the United States courts for violating the State laws in regard to the public health.

Mr. EATON. If he votes.

Mr. WHYTE. Then he is only making a Buncombe speech to kill the bill. If he is speaking against my amendment to load the bill down, then I can understand it; but I do not so take it. I know that the Senator from New York is too ingenuous for that. I know that he would not make an argument against me as if I were making a proposition that was not tenable, when he only wanted to load down the bill and make the bill thereafter more obnoxious than it would be if the amendment prevailed. I cannot believe that. I believe he does not see the thing to-day in the same light that he saw it yesterday; that it is not proper to-day to strike this out which holds a man accountable in a United States court for an offense committed against the State law, while yesterday it was not right when a man committed an assault and battery within the confines of a State, and punishable in the State courts, to punish him again in a United States court. Now, a man can be tried in a State court for counterfeiting. He can be tried for an offense at common law identical in its character with an offense denounced in a statute of the United States, and he can be tried in the United States court for the same offense. Why should not the master of a vessel be tried for an offense against the quarantine laws of a State in a State court, and be tried for an offense against the United States law in regard to quarantine in the United States courts? I do not see any reason why.

On the contrary, I am opposed to this intermingling of offenses against the State and offenses against the United States.

We have had enough of that confusion in the reconstruction acts, the enforcement acts, and the various acts of late years that have grown up in Congress as a part of the legislation of the country. Now let us get back to the old-fashioned rule of keeping offenses against the United States separate and distinct from offenses against the States. It can be done without difficulty, and why should we mingle them; why should we confuse them?

The Senator from Tennessee, or whoever drew the bill which he has in charge, has put in here a provision authorizing the National Board of Health to adopt as its own any regulations of the State boards of health. More than that, there is a power here which authorizes this National Board of Health to trample under foot any quarantine law or regulation of a State board of which they do not approve and substitute other regulations for them, and enforce upon the State board the execution of their laws or their regulations. Though the State board be conscious that in the past, like the State board of New York, they have had good laws capable of keeping disease out of the city of New York, the bill proposes to tell them, "Notwithstanding your experience, notwithstanding the results of your past efforts, you shall change your law. If you do not change it and do not enforce our new law the President of the United States will send a quarantine officer into the port of New York, into the harbor of New York, to take possession of the quarantine of New York and enforce this United States law over the head of the State board of New York."

Then why should we make it penal in the eye of the United States to violate a State law when we have got the power if we choose to take possession of that State law and make it a part of the penal statute of the United States and make its violation punishable as an offense against the United States? Why should we say upon the face of a Federal law that an offense against a State law shall be punished in a United States court?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maryland in jest or in earnest acquitted me of an intention to make what he called a Buncombe speech by disingenuously opposing an amendment I believed in. I infer he did this in jest, because he proceeded in an attempt to convict me of the inconsistency of advocating something yesterday which I oppose to-day. I know that the subtlety of wit is deemed one of its higher qualities, but the obscurity of the intention of the honorable Senator from Maryland baffles my understanding. I have been guilty, I think, of no inconsistency. I tried yesterday to state, as he has been able to-day so much better to state, the repugnance of attempting to punish under national authority the infraction of a State law. I do to-day maintain the same position. I agree with the Senator from Maryland; I would gladly borrow much said by him to enforce and express my conviction.

But if I understand the Senator, he finds some offense against logic in a supposed willingness of mine to tolerate the States in punishing counterfeiting and my unwillingness to approve this bill. Counterfeiting is forgery. One who makes or utters a counterfeit bill, a counterfeit bank-note, is a forger. One who makes a gold or silver or metallic token or device in the similitude and likeness of the coin of the realm, meaning to utter it, especially if he does utter it, commits forgery under the statutes of many States, and the States having such statutes enforce them in their courts.

The honorable Senator from Maryland finds, or thinks he finds, in that circumstance some analogy to this bill, and an analogy injurious to the position I attempted yesterday to state. Does he? I sent for a book which I have not had time to do more than open, as it came as he was taking his seat, in order that I might read in clearer language than I can employ the constitutional and statutory doctrine touching concurrent jurisdiction. There are several instances of jurisdiction concurrent with the national and the State courts. I shall not stop to try to remember them all. Several of them are very familiar. I will suppose that to-day in the city of Baltimore a homicide occurs within the curtilage of Fort McHenry. The question might present itself to the Senator, were he the attorney-general of Maryland, whether the man who committed that homicide was amenable to the laws of Maryland or to the laws of the United States. Fort McHenry is for this purpose within the jurisdiction exclusively of the nation. If the man who did the killing were in the land or naval forces of the United States, for an additional reason, one not pertinent here, he would clearly be amenable to the national or Federal jurisdiction. If he were not in the land or naval forces but was within the close of Fort McHenry, within its parapets or walls, or within the demarkation defining the limits of that fort, on other grounds and for other reasons the question would be whether the trial should take place in a national court and the indictment should be drawn under a statute of the United States, or whether the proceeding should take place in the forum of Maryland.

There would be a case practically of concurrent jurisdiction. If the grand jury of the courts of the United States took cognizance of the act and a bill was presented and a trial had in the national courts, that would end it, and under the statutes, if the jury should find a verdict of manslaughter, manslaughter in the third degree as it would be under the laws of New York if the death were occasioned in the heat of passion, in furor brevis, with a deadly weapon, and the sentence was five years' imprisonment, no lawyer would pretend for one moment that under the jurisdiction of the two powers, the State of Maryland and the nation, the other of these jurisdictions could proceed afterward to try this homicide and lay upon him a fresh punishment in the same measure or in a less measure or a greater measure.

So in the case of counterfeiting coin. If a man were found in Baltimore to-day passing, as dollars, trade-dollars or Bland dollars, metal tokens made of nickel and pewter, he could be indicted for counterfeiting in the courts of the United States. I presume he could be indicted in the courts of Maryland. I do not know what the statutes of Maryland in that regard are. The Senator from Maryland nods, and I infer the man could be indicted in Maryland. The question there practically would be which jurisdiction seized him first. If he were taken into custody by the officers of Maryland and indicted in Maryland, and he should sue out a habeas corpus and the sheriff of the county in which Baltimore is were to make return that he held this man under a bench warrant or under some mandate grounded upon the fact that the laws of Maryland had seized him as an offender, that would be a good return. All that is regulated by the statutes of the two jurisdictions.

Now, what has all that to do with the case before us? How does the Senator from Maryland find a conflict between such truths as these and the argument he himself has made, the same which I attempted yesterday to make? I am unable to see. The pending bill proposes that a man who has committed an offense against the laws of the State of New York shall remain, as he is now, amenable to those laws, but that separate and apart from that, no matter whether he has been punished under those laws or not, he may be seized under the laws of the United States, not for violating them, but for violating the statute of New York, tried in the national courts, visited with a punishment wholly different, and as it so happens in this bill, enormous as I think, but no matter, a punishment wholly different, and that as a part of the proceeding the property of somebody else shall be confiscated for his act.

That is the proposition presented in this bill. That is the proposition against which I argued. That, if I understand the Senator, is the position which he attacks; and I submit to him that it is rather far-fetched, far-fetched in respect of the question before us, and still farther fetched in respect of me, to go out and find that there are cases of homicide and cases of counterfeiting which possibly might be tried either in the State court or in the national court, under separate statutes respectively of these two jurisdictions, in all of which cases one single trial would exhaust the whole remedy and occupy the whole ground, being in that respect as distinguishable from the provision of this bill as the east is distinguishable from the west; being distinguishable also on other grounds.

Mr. President, I can assure the Senator that he was quite right when he absolved me from the suspicion of voting for amendments to load this measure, or making arguments to disparage it unjustly. Nothing of that sort enters my intention. On the contrary, the Senator from Maryland is not more ready, the Senator from Alabama nearer me, [Mr. MORGAN,] who signified the other day his ability and his independence in dealing with this measure when he stated very clearly the law as the law is, is no more ready, nor is the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] to vote for any well-directed measure aimed at yellow fever, or aimed at anything else which concerns the safety and prosperity of any portion of this country.

So true is that that I think I would vote for a measure which nobody has proposed, and which possibly might shock some of the friends of this measure. If I knew a State or several States unable to provide the means to establish quarantine grounds and health offices, willing to do as far forth as they were able, but needing the help of Congress, of the national purse, if I could find in the Constitution either under the power to make internal improvements, improvement of national harbors and channels of commerce, or under any other provision of the Constitution the warrant for doing it, I would vote for a bill granting aid to those States. I think the Senator from Alabama will agree with me that if such a power could be found in the Constitution so that we could consider it as a mere practical question, that would be a kind of aid much better adapted to the occasion and likely to be much more useful to the localities concerned, than such generality of legislation as this. I should expect with some confidence the aid of the honorable Senator from Alabama in perfecting and consummating such legislation, if he and I could find a provision of the Constitution under which we could proceed to do that.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator from New York that I should have no difficulty at all in supporting a bill of that character, because I think that is the precise direction in which the assistance ought to be given, the Government aiding the States in carrying into effect their quarantine and sanitary laws.

Mr. CONKLING. I never heard such a suggestion from the Senator from Alabama before, and when I ascribed to him such a willingness it was on mere conjecture. I heard his statement some days ago of the law as he understands it on this subject. I thought it was a very clear and a very able statement; and, if the Senator will indulge me in saying it, he won my admiration by the statement knowing as I did that it cost him something, surrounded as he is at home by so much anxiety and solicitude on this subject, to stand up and maintain without fear or favor what he believed to be the constitutional doctrine on this regard. From his argument, I was led to suppose that he would give such concurrence as he has now signified in the suggestion I made. I have thought of it before, although I have not ventured to suggest it publicly before. I believe that if a committee would direct its attention to discover the instances, if there be instances, in which an exposed State is unable without aid to establish promptly the quarantine provisions, quarantine ground, the vessel or vessels, and make the arrangements needed, and would seek for the mode of lending assistance to that effort, it would be a proceeding in the right direction, practical certainly; and I am by no means sure, although not at this moment prepared to commit myself, certainly not in exact terms, as to the constitutional question, that the same power which has been customarily invoked to protect harbors, to improve harbors, would not cover the occasion. I am quite sure that the occasion would be more than covered by any constitutional power which can be stretched to authorize Congress to appropriate money to defend riparian owners and the owners of water front upon the harbor of New Orleans, for example, to defend their land against the erosion and encroachment of the tide. If any Senator will point out to me in the Constitution a provision under which we have a right to build sea-walls at the Battery in the city of New York or on the banks of the river or the borders of the sea in Louisiana to prevent the sea from encroaching upon the property of individuals and washing it away, I will undertake to find in that same power authority enough to establish in the harbor of New Orleans, a building, a health office and the other provisions necessary, to see that the traffic which enters that port does not bring along with it and distribute over the country death-dealing germs of disease.

I do not know whether any attention has been given to exploring the permissions of the Constitution in that regard. I shall not dwell upon them, but I will venture the assertion in advance that if such a power does exist its application can be made immensely beneficial as compared with an attempt like this, as compared with an attempt to make a Procrustean bed for every State in the Union, to institute regulations for every port in every latitude, to govern by the same rules all the commerce that floats on the waters of Maine and all the flotillas of fruit-boats and lumber craft which enter the harbors of Florida.

No, Mr. President, whatever other shortcomings are to be confessed, I beg to deny my inconsistency in this regard. I agree with the Senator from Maryland that the attempt is unheard of until now to conjure up offenses to be visited by fine and imprisonment out of the statutes which the States choose to pass. The attempt is unheard of until now to visit those offenses with punishment by national law, and in a measure different from that imposed by the States. The attempt is unheard of until now to put twice in peril of life or limb those who violate the statutes of the States. The attempt is unheard of until now to make a fine denounced upon a culprit or a convict a lien not upon his property but upon the property of we know not whom—absentees as guiltless and as faultless as absentees can be. I will not add, because history will not permit me to add, that the attempt is unheard of to commit to another authority the power to make regulations and then punish their violations as infractions of law. I know that some acts of Congress have gone a great way in that direction. If the only criticism upon this bill was in that regard, that criticism could be answered by several precedents. We have in the revenue laws committed to the Secretary of the Treasury power to make regulations on certain points, and we have declared that the violation of those regulations should be tantamount to the violation of the statute itself. We went into a border country every time that such authority was asserted, but it may be too late to challenge it now.

I do not assign that as one of the grave objections to this bill; but referring without enumerating them again to the other points which I have mentioned, I do insist that they not only are objectionable but that they are novelties in the history of congressional legislation.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from New York should have questioned my sincerity in saying that I did not believe he had made the speech yesterday which he did without feeling sincerely all that he said in that regard. It must have been because he had some doubts himself upon his own sincerity that it suggested itself to him that I had made the remark in jest. I was trying to show that his opposition to my amendment is entirely inconsistent with his argument yesterday. I maintain so still, notwithstanding all the sophistry with which he has indulged us in making his explanation. He argued yesterday upon this very clause, upon this very portion of the section to which I have referred, and against which my amendment is directed, that it was extraordinary in any person to prepare a bill of this character recognizing the rules and regulations of State laws or State boards of health created by State law, making the infraction of them an offense against the laws of the United States and punishing parties therefor in the courts of the United States. He made that very point yesterday, and when I propose to strike out that portion of the bill and leave the offenses which are to be punished only those offenses declared so by this bill or made so under the provisions of this bill, the Senator rises up and opposes that proposition and desires to keep in the bill the very clause which he denounced yesterday as extraordinary in the law. If that is not inconsistent, I do not know what is inconsistent. Let me read his language yesterday. After referring to this clause, he said:

> If they are competent, valid State statutes, then they are just like the statutes punishing forcible entry and detainer, punishing forgery, punishing assault and battery, punishing the obtaining of goods or money by false pretenses or false tokens, are they not? Legally and constitutionally speaking, are they not State statutes in each of the instances I have quoted, of equal authority, and of identical legal nature each with the other? Is it possible that by national statute you can punish a citizen of the State of New York for committing forgery in violation of a statute of New York, for engaging in riot in violation of a statute of New York, for doing any other harm to the statutes of the State of New York?

Yet this section undertakes to do that, and when I propose an amendment which relieves the section of the very objectionable part, the Senator from New York, rises and opposes it. He wants it kept in to-day though yesterday it made the bill ludicrous. I do not see why I should have received the censure of the Senator from New York, because in my innocence and simplicity I thought there was an inconsistency in arguing yesterday that it ought not to be in the law and in arguing to-day, "Do not strike it out of the law but keep it just where it is." It was an ugly feature yesterday, but to-day it is beautiful! To-day it adds symmetry to the measure; yesterday it was awkward in the measure!

Mr. President, I would not attribute any motive to the Senator from New York except that his argument was inconsistent. I thought probably the Senator's mind being constantly filled with great and important subjects, with high ambitions, splendid aspirations, with all those things which sometimes make a man forget to-day what he said yesterday, that the inconsistency grew out of the magnitude and multiform interests which constantly cluster in his mind. But when I find that the Senator censures me because of this, I am compelled to call his attention again to the fact that he did yesterday declaim against this bill because of the very clause which I now ask to strike out, so that we may not be guilty of the absurdity of punishing in the United States courts for an offense committed against a statute of a State—that is all, and I hope my honorable friend from New York will not think for a moment that I was jesting when I said his speech was a speech made through inconsistency and not through insincerity.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it is hardly worth while to prolong this; but the confession, so good for the soul, which the Senator from Maryland has made of his own simplicity, made too with "a smile that was childlike and bland," leads me to occupy the Senate for one moment while I pay a passing tribute to this childlike virtue which so justly he has ascribed to himself.

So unsophisticated is the honorable Senator from Maryland, so simple really has that Senator trained himself to be, that on this day he can see apparently no distinction between two things quite dissimilar from each other. His simplicity leads him to confound a mere recognition of the laws of a State with an attempt to punish by penal enactments of Congress a violation of those laws; and if the honorable Senator could erect a monument more towering and lasting than another to his excessive simplicity as a Senator and a lawyer, he certainly has raised that imposing and majestic shaft when he confesses that he does not know the difference between recognizing and leaving alone the laws of a State and taking them up and adopting them as if they had the force of national statutes and proceeding to beat with many stripes whoever violates them, and confiscate the property of somebody else. My distrust of all the other members of this body is such that I suspect there is no other lawyer in the Senate blessed with such simplicity as that. And I hope the honorable Senator from Maryland, guileless as he is, inexperienced as we know him to be, untaught in the sinuous and devious paths of the law and of human affairs, will nevertheless indulge himself in a contact with actual things sufficiently brusque and rugged to enable him to ascertain that there is a difference between saying in an act of Congress "We recognize and let alone the laws of the State, we do not meddle with them one way or the other," and an attempt to say "We will go into the State, we will visit with chastisement all the men who violate any of the State statutes, we will impose punishments of our own, and we will proceed to confiscate the property of people in general if we choose." I beg the Senator from Maryland to so far forego or permit to be interrupted the simplicity which he does not flatter himself unduly when he claims, to inform himself in this particular, and I say to him that in the very moment in which he allows himself to perceive this distinction, in that same moment he will regret that he has attributed to a brother Senator an inconsistency which has no existence in truth.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to the decision in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, which seems to me to be a very clear answer to all the objections which in the arguments have been made on this subject:

> Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are competent parts of this mass.
> No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and, consequently, they remain subject to State legislation.

It will be borne in mind that this decision is referring to all the objections which are raised in the argument here to the enforcement of the State laws by congressional action. That is the specific point which has been raised in this argument. The court says:

> If the legislative power of the Union can reach them, it must be for national purposes; it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose, or is clearly incidental to some power which is expressly given. It is obvious, that the Government of the Union, in the exercise of its express powers, that, for example, of regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the States, may use means that may also be employed by a State, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers; that, for example, of regulating commerce within the States. If Congress license vessels to sail from one port to another, in the same State, the act is supposed to be, necessarily, incidental to the power expressly granted to Congress, and implies no claim of a direct power to regulate the purely internal commerce of a State, or to act directly on its system of police. So, if a State, in passing laws on subjects acknowledged to be within its control, and with a view to those subjects, shall adopt a measure of the same character with one which Congress may adopt, it does not derive its authority from the particular power which has been granted, but from some other, which remains with the State, and may be executed by the same mean. All experience shows, that the same measures, or measures scarcely distinguishable from each other, may flow from distinct powers; but this does not prove that the powers themselves are identical. Although the means used in their execution may sometimes approach each other so nearly as to be confounded, there are other situations in which they are sufficiently distinct to establish their individuality.
> In our complex system, presenting the rare and difficult scheme of one general government, whose action extends over the whole, but which possesses only certain enumerated powers; and of numerous State governments, which retain and exercise all powers not delegated to the Union, contests respecting power must arise. Were it even otherwise, the measures taken by the respective governments to execute their acknowledged powers, would often be of the same description, and might, sometimes, interfere. This, however, does not prove that the one is exercising, or has a right to exercise, the powers of the other.

It was upon the authority of this decision thus exhaustively defining the operation of the national power and the State power, showing that under the authority to regulate commerce the National Government might by an act of Congress adopt the same measures as the State, and make the State quarantine or health law an act of Congress, regulating commerce, that the great commentator, Mr. Justice Story, used the language which I read yesterday and which still seems to me to cover the whole ground of the argument in this case. That language is as follows:

Congress may make that a regulation of commerce which a State may employ as a guard for its internal policy, or to preserve the public health or peace, or to promote its own peculiar interests.

As to the objection that has been made in the argument here today that this bill undertakes to make by congressional enactment a violation of a State law punishable in the courts of the United States, I take it that the answer to that proposition is exceedingly easy. Of course it is incompetent for the National Government by an act of Congress to make a State law penal in its courts, except that it may adopt, as the commentator, Mr. Story, says, any State law upon a subject which it has the power to legislate upon; and although terms of criticism might be made on the language of this bill in adopting the quarantine laws of the States, it surely would be competent (for Congress has the power to legislate on the subject) to make the State law operative and to enforce it. I say it is so expressly laid down in the decision from which I have read.

It seems to me that it is very important that some conclusion should be arrived at upon this bill, and I am indifferent whether it be done by an amendment that will declare that under the provisions of this law there shall be no second punishment or no second imposition of pains or penalties, or whether it is done by passing the bill as it stands; but I hope these objections will not be allowed to interfere with the passage of the bill. I do not see any reason why there may not be in this bill as in every other case an application of the law which forbids a man being subjected twice to a penalty for the same offense.

The distinguished Senator from New York admits that the revenue laws of this country do confer the very power which is objected to here upon the Secretary of the Treasury to make regulations and do make the violation of those regulations an offense punishable in the courts of the United States. The laws which we have been discussing here for the last two weeks, the laws relating to the elective franchise, do in distinct terms declare that a violation of the State law upon subjects in regard to which there is no act of Congress shall be punishable in the courts of the United States; and yet they are maintained upon the other side of the Chamber as laws that should be enforced and maintained.

The old act of Congress which declares that the laws of the different States prescribing rules of practice in the State courts should be enforced in the courts of the United States without specifying what those rules are, thus varying the procedure and practice according to the law of each different State, is another instance exactly in point.

I submit, therefore, Mr. President, that these objections do not attach. I have very great diffidence in presenting this view, but I submit that the authority of the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden is complete and covers all the points that have been raised here. It is to the effect that where a State has made a quarantine or health law the Congress of the United States may adopt and enforce that law by an act of Federal legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear that amendment reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in line 8, section 1, to strike out the words "or sanitary associations recognized by this act or" and insert "all rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act;" and in line 9 to strike out "thereof" and insert "of this act;" so as to read:

Except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health, and all rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EATON. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7 of section 1 it is proposed to strike out all from the word "act" down to and including the word "act" in line 9, as follows:

And all rules and regulations of State boards of health and all rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act.

Mr. WHYTE. The amendment adopted by the Senate, proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, since I offered my amendment of course changes the character of my amendment, and therefore I shall change the amendment and shall ask a vote upon the amendment as now modified. The bill having been amended on line 8 and new words inserted by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, my amendment now will only be in reference to line 7, to strike out "and all rules and regulations of State boards of health," and then it will read:

Except in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland as modified.

Mr. TELLER. We do not want the yeas and nays on this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will regard the yeas and nays as not ordered on the amendment as now proposed.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. In deference to the views of a number of Senators, I propose, in line 12 of section 1, to strike out the word "five," the last word in the line, and insert "one." This reduces the penalty from $5,000 to $1,000; and in the opinion of the committee a penalty of $1,000 will secure obedience to this law just as well as a penalty of $5,000. At the suggestion of several Senators I propose to so modify it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out in the thirteenth line of the first section, commencing at the word "which," to and including the word "States," in the fifteenth line. This strikes out all of the section that makes this fine a lien upon the vessel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado is to strike out the words which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words proposed to be stricken out are:

Which shall be a lien upon said vessel, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. In section 3, line 3, to conform to the amendment made to the first section, I move to strike out the words "and sanitary associations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EATON. I suggest to my friend from Tennessee that in the fifth line of that same section the words "and associations" should be stricken out.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 5, section 3, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, it would be advisable to strike out the words "and associations" after the word "boards." I make that motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the first section as it now stands makes it unlawful for any vessel, &c., "to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health." The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] reminds me that while I was absent on the service of the Senate upon a committee, those words also have been stricken out, and conformity to "this act" is required. That brings us then to the question what is conformity with this act.

Mr. ALLISON. Those words have not been struck out.

Mr. CONKLING. The words stricken out are these: "or sanitary associations recognized by this act or;" so that the bill now reads:

Except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health, and all rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act.

Mr. WHYTE. I moved to strike that clause out, but the Senator from New York opposed it, and I got no support whatever. Those words remain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I was right in my first point that I wished to call the attention of the Senate to, that this first section makes the rules and regulations of State boards of health the test of the right of any vessel to enter the United States. These rules and regulations are not merely those that already exist alone, but I think by any fair construction of the language they apply to any future rules or regulations that States may make. If it were the first case and applied only to existing rules and regulations, the propriety of this provision would depend upon our knowing precisely what the rules and regulations of all the State boards of health that border on the seaboard where vessels can enter are, because we are enacting for the purposes of penalties and punishments State regulations already existing into the law of the United States. That states it I think in the most favorable way to those who believe this bill is constitutional, because if you state it in the other way and the natural way it is merely a provision that the United States will punish any person who violates the law of a State. And yet on that point, when you take it under another and more definite provision of the Constitution than regulations of commerce, we are told by a majority of this Senate, if I can judge from indications and votes, that it is absolutely beyond the constitutional power of Congress to so far interfere with State regulations respecting the election of members of Congress as to punish the interference with any officer of the United States who stands by to observe and see that the election of a member of Congress is conducted in accordance with State law, that State law being made in pursuance of the express language not of the constitution of the State but of the United States, which declares that the States by force of the Constitution of the United States, and not by any other force, shall make and prescribe regulations for the election of members of Congress, and that Congress may at any time make similar regulations or alter those that the State has made.

Now, therefore, we have a case where the Constitution explicitly imposes upon the States the duty in the first instance of making regulations for the election of members of Congress, and in the same phrase and in the same breath says that Congress itself may put new regulations in their place or alter those that already exist. That Senators on the other side of the Chamber, speaking politically, all say, I believe, by their votes and some by their speeches, is an unconstitutional interference with the rights of the States. They contend that whatever Congress might do by an independent act of its own establishing the entire regulations to be exerted through officers of its own, so long as Congress allows the State regulations to stand it cannot provide for observing and testing the fidelity of State officers in conforming to those regulations, although the sole right of the State to make them and of the State officers to conform to them is derived from the Constitution of the United States itself. It imposes that duty upon the several States, because the several States without the Constitution of the United States would have no authority to elect members of Congress as the representatives of the people. The State constitutions could not have members of Congress because Congress itself does not exist by the State constitutions. And so the Constitution of the United States provided that there should be a Congress, that it should have members, and it commanded the States severally to make regulations respecting the election of such members, and at the same time, as I have said, it authorized Congress to control those regulations, to change them, and to see that the duty was performed. That, Senators say is unconstitutional, and a majority of this Chamber votes apparently that it is, because in voting for the repeal of these provisions that were proposed to be repealed in the bills that have passed this body, it has not been upon the ground that the regulations Congress made of observation and supervision were intrinsically wrong, for they are what every well-regulated State feels is necessary for its elections be they State or municipal. And yet when you turn over a few leaves in the Constitution of the United States and come to a provision which says that Congress may regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, saying nothing whatever of the duties of States, imposing no duty upon them, granting no right to them, then it is said that it is perfectly constitutional to declare under that head that anybody who violates a regulation of a State concerning health (which the Constitution of the United States as it has been understood down to this time has always been supposed to leave to the States themselves just as the ordinary good order and police and conduct of its citizens were left to them) may be punished in the United States courts by a penalty, which necessarily implies dominion, power to make laws upon the subject. Here it is said you may declare that whoever violates the State health laws shall be punished by the laws of the United States.

I submit to Senators on the other side (the sincerity of whose views on the other question where the Constitution does speak to States and to Congress in respect of elections I do not impugn in the slightest degree) that if it will not do for Congress to interfere in that case, how can we stand upon this? We might stand upon the other, because to my mind the Constitution gives the power clearly, but here you go entirely at sea, and you say that whoever violates the laws of a State respecting health—to state it in the best way for those who maintain that side—shall be punished by the United States. Indeed the act itself reads that whoever violates the regulations of a State board of health, which may be a mere private corporation like the ten thousand corporations that under the operations of the laws of the States and their society are continually raised up and that are private corporations,—eleemosynary charitable corporations, health boards, and so forth, that have an independent corporate existence and who have a charter that the State cannot change unless it has reserved the power to change it when it granted the charter—whoever violates any such rules and regulations as those shall be punished by a law of the United States! I should like to have some Senator just discuss that point, not in reference to the good objects of this bill, because we all agree as to them, but in reference to the principle that is inherent in Congress declaring such a thing as that. If you may say that Congress may punish the violation of a health law of a State, how are you to say that Congress cannot punish by laws that it makes the infraction of any other law of a State, whatever it may be, as to assault and battery, theft, arson, murder, or anything else. By the laws of all the States the crimes that I have just mentioned, assault and battery, arson, murder are punished. They always have been. No State could consider itself civilized that did not provide for such punishment; every State has such laws; always has had, always will have. Now, take sundry of these States where unhappy conditions of things have existed, other States where unhappy conditions of things do continually exist from the nature of society; it is said in respect of a Southern State, for instance, that there have been political assaults and batteries, political arsons, political murders, that is to say infractions of other people's rights growing out of political motives of some kind or other; and one party in this country believes that the States by their means and their authorities, although the law is sufficient, will not execute that law; that the grand juries will not find bills; that the district attorneys will not file informations in cases where it may be proper; that petit juries will not convict; and the United States comes in with a law saying that whoever violates the State law in South Carolina, or Vermont, or Mississippi, or New York, or wherever it may be, (because that class of crimes exists in all the States, differing in degree, sometimes in a greater degree in one State and sometimes in another,) shall be punished under a law of the United States, and thereupon such a law being passed a man is tried for murder in Vermont and he gets off by the county jury; that under the constitution of Vermont must be the jury that is to try him—a jury of the county where the offense is committed, and the man is acquitted. Then the district attorney of the United States proceeds, or the grand jury in a case of murder under the Constitution finds a bill, against the same man, and he is tried over again. I put an extreme case that the man has once been tried and acquitted, and he is tried over again. What sort of a system of laws is that which you are getting up?

Suppose the other and the more common case looking at it from the eyes of what may be called political prejudice and speaking of it as a principle; suppose a majority of the people of this country in electing members of Congress and Senators by and by seem to think that in a certain portion of this Union protection to life and liberty is not adequately administered under the State laws, the State laws being as I say good enough on the face of them, as they are in all the States where they provide for the punishment of all these crimes; and we propose to pass a law declaring that whoever shall be guilty of violating the statutes of the State of Vermont or any other State by the crime of murder shall be indictable in the courts of the United States and punishable therefor; how many votes do you suppose in this body you could get on either side of the Chamber in any state of parties for it? It is plain you could not get any at all I think I am safe in saying, assuming to speak for my political associates in this Chamber, that it could not get a republican vote and I am safe I think in saying that it could not get a democratic vote. Why? Because every Senator would say "it is plainly unconstitutional; private murder is the thing that belongs to the States in respect of its punishment, and the administration of its laws." I am not that speaking of where a public officer engaged in exerting the powers of the laws of the United States is murdered, which may be another thing; I do not say whether it is or not. Everybody would say now the Constitution would not warrant that kind of legislation.

Now here is a provision to preserve the health of the people of the United States, which is merely another way of preserving the lives of the people of the United States, one means of preserving their lives. In the case of murder that I have spoken of, you preserve the lives of the people of the United States against violence by their fellow-men; in respect of health you preserve the people of the United States against death from the spread of contagious diseases. Where is the difference in principle in respect of the power of Congress to say that you will punish the violation of a State law? I should like to hear somebody argue that question so that I can understand it, speaking as I am trying to do right to the point, where we get the constitutional authority to do it. When I say that, I beg everybody to understand that I am not speaking against the motive of this bill, quite the reverse, for I think I sympathize with the motive quite as much as anybody can.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire to ask the honorable Senator one question, not with reference to the election laws, which he has mixed up with this subject, nor with the purpose of criticising the analogy he has drawn, but to learn whether the Senator is to be understood as denying the constitutional power of Congress to affix a penalty to the violation of a State law under any circumstances whatever?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot think of any case at this moment; there may be some that the Senator can suggest; but it appears to me to be contrary to the whole theory of this Government that it is competent for the United States to affix a penalty for the violation of a State law just as much as I should say it was entirely incompetent for a State to affix a penalty for the violation of a law of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. It is a delegation of the law-making power to State Legislatures.

Mr. LAMAR. I am supposing a case in which the Congress of the United States and a State Legislature have concurring jurisdiction. The question that I put is whether, in such case, Congress may adopt a State law or the law in a State as its own, and affix a penalty to it to be enforced through the Federal court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends upon what the Senator from Mississippi means by "adopt." I do not by any means deny, because everybody who knows anything of law or history would know it was a denial against the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, that the Congress of the United States in cases of concurrent jurisdiction—and there are some cases of that kind, I have never heard that health was one before, but passing that and coming right to the point——

Mr. LAMAR. I am not speaking about the question of the application.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In cases of concurrent jurisdiction each power exerting that jurisdiction may undoubtedly affix penalties for violation of what it says shall not be done. Take the case of counterfeiting. The Constitution of the United States says——

Mr. LAMAR. I can suggest a case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me one moment until I answer his present suggestion and then I shall be glad to hear him. Take the case of counterfeiting. The Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to punish counterfeiting of the coin &c. of the United States. States have made provisions in their laws of the same kind, not saying that anybody who violates the act of Congress against counterfeiting shall be punished, but saying that anybody who commits the act of counterfeiting by forging the coin or securities of the United States and trying to defraud the people of that State by putting them off shall be punished; and the courts have said that that is a case of concurrent jurisdiction, that each State having supreme and sovereign dominion over the conduct of its own citizens is not limited in the exercise of that dominion by the fact that there is another power that has a similar dominion in that particular case over citizens of that other power, that is to say over citizens of the United States; and therefore the citizen is amenable to two jurisdictions; either may command him not to do a particular act, but each commands him in its own right, speaking directly to the fact of what he is to do, and not in reference to the laws of the other at all. In that instance it is clear, according to the decided cases, and I think according to the philosophy of this singular Government which we have, that each sovereignty may exert itself according to its own notions of what is fit and reasonable against the same man for the same act, and that the man may be punished twice for precisely the same act; he may suffer double penalties. Of course in a case of capital punishment it would be somewhat difficult for the power that came in second to do any particular harm to the culprit. Now I will hear my honorable friend.

Mr. LAMAR. I think the Senator has not exactly, owing to my own want of clearness in stating my question, apprehended the point of it. It is whether Congress has, under no circumstances, the constitutional power to enforce the provisions of a State law, not as a State law, but adopting it, or, if the Senator does not like that term, enacting it as a Federal law operating within the State. I will give an illustration. Does the Senator admit that it is now unlawful for any ship to enter into any port of the United States in any State against the quarantine laws or health laws of that State? Is it unlawful or not? Is it not against the existing law of the United States for a ship to enter a port in any State against the quarantine laws of that State?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my honorable friend has the statute which says that, I should like to hear it.

Mr. LAMAR. The statute of 1799 provides:

> The quarantine and other restraints established by the health laws of any State respecting any vessels arriving in or bound to any port or district thereof shall be duly observed by the officers of the customs revenue of the United States, &c.

And it further directs these persons and the military officers in command of any fort or station upon the sea-coast to aid in the execution of these laws to the extent of their powers.

Now this is a case in which the Congress of the United States has designated certain State laws to be not only observed by Federal officers, but also to be to a certain extent enforced by Federal officers and agents. The statutes of these States are here enforced by the national authority upon its own officers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, that was a statute that I was not altogether ignorant of; but I do not see its analogy to this, which is probably my misfortune.

The State laws, consistently with the Constitution of the United States and independent of it, and in a respect where the Constitution of the United States does not touch the sovereignty of the State, and in regard to which the sovereignty of the State was never in any degree surrendered, may provide, as they do provide in many States, for the preservation of the health of the citizens of the State. That being the state of the constitutional law, Congress having no power to interfere with the health laws of the State, and the State having health laws, but Congress having the right to regulate commerce, that is, the introduction from foreign countries in the point that I am now speaking of,—of course I am not giving a complete definition—of everything that falls under the head of commerce, which relates to the trade of the United States, including passengers I admit, foreign intercourse,—Congress having that right and the State at the same time having the absolute and exclusive right to guard the health of the State, the two powers go on, and the act of 1799 said that in executing the laws of the United States relating to commerce the agents of the United States should not violate the law of the State which regulated its health.

Mr. LAMAR. Exactly. Now the Senator, I understand, construes the statute to mean an injuction upon the officers of the United States not to violate the law of the State in reference to health.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; that is it. In other words, the officers of one jurisdiction are commanded by that jurisdiction, in exercising their duties for one purpose, not to violate and invade another jurisdiction that belongs to another power. That is what the act of 1799 is; and it is a good act, and I think it is lawful.

Mr. LAMAR. I am not seeking to elicit the reasons of the Senator's opinion, but the opinion itself. I understand him now to state that the principle of the act of 1799 is that Congress made it unlawful for any United States officers or the masters or crews of revenue-cutters to violate the quarantine law of the State, in the cases stated, for the reasons he has given. If so, can it not enforce that law by prescribing a penalty for such violation upon its officers or other persons?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt that it can, because the United States has supreme jurisdiction over the acts of its own officers, and when it regulates their official duties, it may prescribe a penalty for the violation of those duties. That is plain enough. But this act is not operating upon the officers of the United States; it is operating upon the citizens of States as well as citizens of the United States; and it is quite a different thing to say to an officer of the United States in doing your duties under your commercial powers you shall not infringe upon the jurisdiction of a State as to its health laws, and if you do, you shall be punished.

Mr. LAMAR. I make no issue with the Senator upon that distinction. It may be that the statute to which I referred went no further than the officers therein mentioned. The point I wished to call the Senator's attention to, and as to which I have got an answer such as I expected, is that Congress can affix a penalty to a violation of a State law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By its own officer, because in violating that State law he has violated the law of the United States that prescribes the duty of the officer.

Mr. LAMAR. Precisely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, when you come to a case of a person who is not an officer of the United States you are remitted, as it appears to me, although I rose to get information instead of giving it, to a different exercise of power.

Mr. LAMAR. The Senator will permit me. When it is not an officer of the United States but a citizen, the question then arises as to the jurisdiction of Congress over those citizens upon that subject-matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. LAMAR. And if the Senator is of the opinion that Congress has jurisdiction over that subject-matter and over those persons, the question then is whether Congress may not exercise its jurisdiction in this method we are now discussing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has stated the position somewhat differently from what I did, which might make all the difference. The right of the United States to punish its own officers for doing anything that it forbids, it appears to me is plain, without any reference to the question as to whether it is a State law or anything else. But the right of the United States to punish its own citizens for anything that it forbids is a good deal limited by the Constitution of the United States, as the Senator has very often said and as his political friends have said and as I have said. We all say it. It is not a question of aggression in the political debates we have had when we understand each other and come right down to the point—not a question of aggression by the one power against the other; it is the question of trying to find the dividing line. That is all we want to do on either side, I hope; certainly it is all that I want to do. So the Senator at once will see that it is one thing for the United States having an officer charged with certain duties respecting the revenue which are perfectly and plainly constitutional, to say to him "in exercising those duties which we may lawfully impose upon you and grant to you, you must be careful not to invade the province of an independent and sovereign jurisdiction." Now, when you come to the case of a simple citizen, if we have any right to speak at all, it is because the Constitution of the United States has given it to us over him in his character as a citizen, and not in his character of an agent of the United States. There is the difference. If you say that you have a jurisdiction over him as a citizen in respect to violating the health laws of a State, then you must say that you have a jurisdiction over him as a citizen in respect to violating every other law of a State, so far as I can see; and if anybody can suggest a distinction, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. LAMAR. I will try to suggest one. It may not be a sound one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. LAMAR. Over many subjects of legislation the States have exclusive jurisdiction. In fact, on all matters in reference to which the States have not delegated their powers to the General Government their jurisdiction is exclusive. Of course Congress could not by its legislation enforce the laws of a State upon such subjects; but upon matters over which Congress has a concurring jurisdiction and paramount jurisdiction, I think then, and in such case, it has the constitutional power to recognize and adopt the laws of a State and to enforce them by penalties upon individuals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it may. But when you come to enforcing these penalties upon individuals, they must be enforced, as the Senator says, in a respect as to which Congress has jurisdiction. Now, Congress has jurisdiction in respect to commerce. It has not jurisdiction, I will assume for the purpose of this argument, and I believe it besides, in respect to health. That is left, with all the other police powers, to the States. So far, therefore, as Congress is exercising the power to regulate commerce and trade, it may say to any man if you do a particular act, as if you bring an infected ship into a port of the United States, you shall be punished. It may be that Congress has that power, that it might fall within the regulation of commerce, perhaps, although philosophically considered it is not a matter of commerce, it is a matter of health. But if you have that power, then the question is whether, in order to apply your penalty, you must not say that if any man does bring an infected ship he shall be punished instead of saying that if any man brings a ship contrary to the law of a State he shall be punished. That is quite a different thing, as it appears to me.

Now, let me illustrate a little further, Mr. President. As is suggested by my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] we have ministers under the Constitution of the United States accredited to foreign courts. May we not provide by law that any minister of the United States at a foreign court who should violate the laws of that foreign state to which he is accredited, should be punished under the laws of the United States? Who can question it, because the minister himself ordinarily cannot be punished by the laws of the country to which he is accredited. He is the nation, and his person is inviolable under the laws of nations. Does it follow, because the United States may be authorized to punish its own agents in a foreign country for a misbehavior against the laws of that country, that it might punish a citizen of the United States who was amenable to the foreign jurisdiction for the same offense? Suppose Congress should say that any citizen of the United States domiciled in Canada who should commit the crime of murder there should be punished by the United States, would anybody claim that that was a constitutional law? If so, I should like to hear somebody stand up and say it and give his reasons and the grounds on which he can stand for such an opinion. The citizen in that case is out of the jurisdiction entirely of the power that is undertaking to exercise dominion over him, although he is still a citizen. In that respect, he is within the jurisdiction of another power who is competent to deal with him. The agent of the United States that we call a minister is not out of the jurisdiction of the United States; he bears the United States with him, and he is not within the jurisdiction of the State to which he is accredited, in the general and public sense of that term. There have been exceptions which have led to wars it is true, but I am speaking of the general average of intelligent opinion.

There is the difficulty, and therefore I say, Mr. President, that, with entire sympathy, as of course everybody must have for this bill, it does appear to me that we are undertaking to strain the Constitution of the United States beyond what the most violent partisan when you apply the same principle to political questions has ever claimed that it could be strained. That is the thing that troubles me. I believe in national authority, and I believe, as was stated by the Senator from Maryland the other day, that the only national authority that exists is that which the Constitution of the United States has delegated, reposed in the National Government, and the Constitution in explicit terms declares that all the powers not delegated are reserved to the States or to the people, no matter which for this purpose. What I fear is that, in taking this step that we are all incited to by considerations which appeal in common to every part of the country,—the same considerations that led those parts of the country not afflicted a year or two ago with this terrible scourge to do all that they could in a friendly and fraternal way to mitigate the suffering in those parts,—the same sentiment is going to lead us by legislation to take a step that is destructive of the separate and independent and exclusive exertion of powers that under the Constitution and by it have been reserved to the respective States, and particularly in this form of declaring, for the first time I believe in the history of this country, that any person who violates a particular State law or State regulation shall be punished for that thing by the laws of the United States.

I think that would be a power which could hardly be maintained in a case in which the power of the United States to punish the act itself was absolutely clear. I think an act of Congress that should declare that any person who should violate the laws of the State of Vermont or any other of the States in respect of coin should be punished by the penalties prescribed by the State law, would not stand the test of judicial scrutiny, while an act of Congress that would punish the same man for the same act by declaring in terms that whoever counterfeited the coin of the United States should be punished would. There is to my mind a wide legal distinction; and yet here we declare on the subject of health that whoever violates a State law of health past, present, or future, shall be punished by force of this act. Even if we had the power to punish violations of common security regarding health by saying that whoever brought from one town in the State of Vermont to another town a person infected with yellow fever or with the cholera or with the small-pox should be punished; granted that we should have the power, (which I deny,) would such a bill as this be a proper exercise of authority? I do not admit by any means that we should have the power to say that whoever violated the laws of the State of Vermont respecting small-pox, yellow fever, or cholera should be punished. But here are two very different things as it appears to me, and I fear that Senators who incline to favor this bill from the motives that are common to us all, will find when they reflect upon it that they have taken a step which is far more fatal to the independence and sovereignty of the States that we all believe in in accordance with the Constitution, than any of the wildest political legislation that they have found so much fault with and that they so sincerely believe is entirely beyond our constitutional power.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York has kindly called my attention to the very words of the act of 1799 which I think will state as strongly as anything can the distinction that I have been trying to state. The object of that act was to do everything that Congress could to aid the States in the preservation of health. Now to what is it directed? To citizens? Not at all. It is directed to the exertion by officers of the United States of the powers that are intrusted to them as officers, and not otherwise. It is this:

> The quarantines and other restraints established by the health laws of any State, respecting any vessels arriving in, or bound to, any port or district thereof, shall be duly observed by the officers of the customs revenue of the United States, by the masters and crews of the several revenue-cutters, and by the military officers commanding in any fort or station upon the sea-coast;—

And so forth——

Mr. LAMAR. Read the next sentence.

Mr. EDMUNDS.

> And all such officers of the United States shall faithfully aid——

Mr. LAMAR. Go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS.

> Aid in the execution of such quarantines and health laws, according to their respective powers—

That is, so far as they have the power in doing their duty according to their powers—> and within their respective precincts, and as they shall be directed, from time to time, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

There you will see, Mr. President, that the fathers in 1799 adopted the very distinction that I have endeavored so imperfectly to state, and that is that the agents and officers of the United States in respect of the exertion of the powers that they did have should do everything that they could to conform to and faithfully observe the regulations of an independent power that the States possessed in respect to their health.

Mr. LAMAR. And aid in their execution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And aid in their execution just as under the Constitution the United States aids in the execution of the laws of a State where they are interfered with by domestic violence when the proper call is made upon the United States. In other words, it was an act of comity directing the officers of the United States, over whom we have jurisdiction, in the exertion of their duties, to aid the officers of the States in exerting their powers. That is comity. When you come to citizens it is quite a different thing.

Mr. HOAR. There is nothing there which requires the officers of the United States to aid in the enforcement of penal or criminal State legislation at all. The general statement that to the extent of their powers they shall aid in the enforcement of the health laws, would enable them to aid in the removal of persons without force to a hospital, to aid in the erection of a hospital, to aid in sweeping a street, or anything of that kind. That does not at all contemplate the action of the United States officer as a criminal or health officer, as a person enforcing criminal or penal laws on the citizens of the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is plain enough. It is an act of harmony between two jurisdictions that exist for separate objects but which impinge upon each other on the sea-coast. The jurisdiction of the United States upon the sea-coast is a jurisdiction of commerce. It has officers to exert that jurisdiction. It commands its officers in exerting that jurisdiction to act in harmony with a similar but independent jurisdiction of the States for an entirely different purpose; and that is all there is to it.

Mr. LAMAR. I wish to disclaim having read from this statute for the purpose that the Senator from Massachusetts seems to think I read it for. I did not suppose that it contained any direction to the officers to enforce any penalty. That was not my purpose at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know that I get the exact scope of the argument of my friend from Vermont; and because of the respect I have for his legal opinion I should like to apprehend exactly whether he intended to convey to the Senate his doubt as to the power of the United States Government to enforce quarantine at all. Is that the way I shall understand the Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I gave the best definition I could of the powers of the United States. I do not believe the powers of the United States extend to the health of citizens of the United States at all. They extend to the commerce of the United States. Whatever falls under the head of commerce, the United States may enforce. But granting that they may, this bill does not undertake, as it appears to me, to do that, but it undertakes to provide that whoever violates a law or regulation of a State, to put it in its best sense, shall be punished. That I do not believe they can do.

Mr. BLAINE. We do that in the election laws.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I deny the proposition; but if we do it in the election laws we do it because the Constitution of the United States in express terms says we may.

Mr. BLAINE. Then my friend acknowledges that we do it in the election laws?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not that we do; I say "if we do."

Mr. BLAINE. We do punish them here in the section now before me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see if we do.

Mr. BLAINE. Section 2005 of the Revised Statutes provides:

> When, under the authority of the constitution or laws of any State, or the laws of any Territory, any act is required to be done as a prerequisite or qualification for voting, and by such constitution or laws persons or officers are charged with the duty of furnishing to citizens an opportunity to perform such prerequisite, or to become qualified to vote, every such person and officer shall give to all citizens of the United States the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite, and to become qualified to vote.

If that is denied by the officer, the United States punishes him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the United States punish the act. They do not say that whoever violates a State law in that respect shall be punished; they say that whoever denies to a man the equality that the Constitution from one point of view, from our point of view gives to him—not from the other point,—that man shall be punished for the act of denial.

Mr. BLAINE. Denial of what?

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that because the Constitution of the United States has said that there shall be this equality and that Congress may pass any law needful to enforce it.

Mr. BLAINE. But here is a section that does not have any reference to the Constitution of the United States. Of course I am in favor of this section, and so is the Senator from Vermont; but I do not understand how the Senator from Vermont can go so far in upholding this legislation and see no authority whatever for the other. We come to rather a strange contradiction. Our friends on the other side cannot see a particle of power for the clear exercise of a constitutional right to regulate the elections, which my friend so ably enforced, and when it comes to this law they see the power very clearly, and just at that point it becomes a little blind and obscure to the honorable Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in the least blind and obscure to me.

Mr. BLAINE. It is mutatis mutandis. Now, it seems to me very clear that on the basis of the necessity of the case this power must exist in the United States Government. Take the great city of New York; I should call it an imperial city and I venture as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] is not in his seat and will not hold me to the definition. It is the great metropolis and emporium of the continent. Suppose New Jersey should fail and there is a want of co-operation and harmony between the two States. To be sure there naturally is not, they having a common interest; but suppose for any cause New Jersey should utterly fail to aid New York and should do the things which would be offensive to the health of the city of New York or injurious to it and refuse to do those things which were needful for it, because New York has no jurisdiction, what would my honorable friend say then? That New York, the chief commercial port of the nation, was bound to suffer because New Jersey just on the shore a mile off would not do the things which she ought to do and would persist in doing the things she ought not to do, "and there is no health in her," as the Senator from Massachusetts remarks, to carry out the liturgy—where is there an exercise of the national power that comes in so essential as just at that point.

It was complained by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG,] and I believe with some show of truth, that a good deal of the great peril and suffering from yellow fever last year came from the relaxation in Louisiana of the needful restrictions that had been placed there. Suppose the entire health of the Mississippi Valley required restrictions at the mouth of the Mississippi which Louisiana did not wish to enforce, does my honorable friend from Vermont say the power does not exist in the National Government to do it? Are ten, fifteen, or twenty million people living in the Mississippi Valley to have their health imperiled and a pestilence impending because a State at the mouth of that river refuses or is unable or unwilling to do the things necessary? If there ever was an imaginable case where the power of the National Government came in, that is the case.

I have in my hand an authentic document showing the places in which the yellow fever has been in this country for the last two centuries. I believe since 1741 it has visited the city of New York sixty-three times; that it has been there and about its harbor that many times. I do not, of course, mean as an epidemic. It has not been frequently an epidemic there, but it was severely epidemic in some years. Let me just give the statistics, because they are instructive.

In the year 1798 the deaths in New York City from yellow fever were two thousand and eighty. I do not at this moment recall what the population of the city of New York was in 1798, but it could not have been much over thirty thousand. Apply that proportion to its million population to-day, supposing the fever to rage with anything like that ferocity, and the deaths would be beyond anything we have ever known in the history of epidemics.

There is a general idea throughout the country with the present generation that this disease which we are now legislating about is something peculiar to the South. That is an egregious error. Right on the borders of my own State within the last seventy-five years, in the town of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, where no regulations that Maine could make would have the slightest possible effect for lack of jurisdiction, in what was then a small village there were one hundred deaths. During the war—and I want the honorable Senator from Vermont to give his attention to the point—during the war the yellow fever broke out at exactly the same spot, because a vessel from the naval fleet off the African coast came home to the Kittery navy-yard with it, and it broke out with virulence, and it was the United States authority that stepped in and used the most heroic effort and adopted the most heroic means, and was successful in suppressing and dispelling the disease after eighteen or twenty deaths; and no other party could have done it so promptly and efficiently, it seems to me.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state, to emphasize what the Senator from Maine has said, that the fact was developed in the investigation by the commission at New Orleans last winter that the officer in charge of the quarantine below that city appointed by the governor of the State—as he testified himself before the commission—had not seen a case of yellow fever before in twenty years; and the quarantine regulations superintended and carried on by that officer were a complete and entire failure.

Mr. BLAINE. There is another suggestion that occurs to my mind why this should be a power exercised by the national authority. The States that are on the coast-line do not embrace the whole country. There is a vast inland territory composed of as many States. With the rapid intercommunication we have by water and still more largely by rail, the States in the interior are just as liable to be visited by this plague if it once gets upon the coast. They do not in the nature of things have quarantine laws, but they are just as much interested in quarantine laws as the States that are compelled to enact them. Arkansas is just as much interested in the quarantine laws of Louisiana as Louisiana itself. Missouri is, and so are all the States in the interior. It is a matter of public and general health that no man can possibly set a limit to, no man can circumscribe it, and if it once enters within our gates no man can foresee the terrible development of it.

I do not know that all the provisions of this bill are precisely what they should be. I do not pretend to have given it any special examination myself or to be very competent to decide if I had; but I am very firmly persuaded that this is a power which the National Government ought to exercise, and it is directly in the line of the national power to do it and the national necessity to have it done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it may be that this is a power that the National Government ought to exercise, but the first thing to be found out inasmuch as the National Government is a government of delegated powers would be whether that power had been delegated which ought to be exercised. There are a great many things that we think from time to time ought to be done that confessedly the Constitution has not authorized us to do. Now let us test it in this way which I think is a fair test and if it is not I hope somebody will point out the infirmity of it: If the United States has jurisdiction to enact laws of this character that we are now speaking of, it has jurisdiction to enact just such laws as it likes. It is not confined to the power of enacting a statute that requires everybody to obey the State law. If it has that power, it has the power because it is inherent in the United States. If it is inherent, it has the power to enact a mode that is entirely different from the State law and in conflict with it. Suppose, then, on the question of health the United States enacts one law as to the port of New York and all the other ports of the United States; the State of New York and all the other States that have ports enact a different law, the two laws standing entirely in conflict, the United States law saying that one thing may be done and another thing shall not, and the State law saying that the other thing shall be done and the first thing shall not, and then you go to the judicial courts; which law is to prevail?

Mr. BLAINE. The supreme law enacted by Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Maine says the supreme law enacted by Congress. If it is the supreme law, of course it will prevail; and if this act adopting the State law (to put it in the best way that the Senator from Mississippi did) is constitutional, then an act of Congress that repeals the State law and sets it aside is constitutional.

Mr. BLAINE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. Then you have got the proposition that Congress may regulate between every State and in every State and on all the sea-coast a code of health laws for the whole United States that will override and set aside and annul every State law. I deny the proposition. I assert that in my solemn belief the Constitution of the United States has reserved to the States a power that the judges of the Supreme Court have always heretofore recognized in terms as being exclusively with the States, the power to regulate the conduct of their own citizens in respect of health, as it has in almost all the other respects of personal conduct; and therefore if you take this step you must follow it up—my friend from Maine goes the whole figure—and say it is in the power of Congress to enact a code of health laws for the whole Union, in the States and out of them; and if there be a power to enact a code of health laws, why not laws respecting personal demeanor and every kind of law that respects personal conduct, because health is one of the common elements only, the preservation of personal life; that is all there is to it,—the good of society. If Congress has the power to do that, it has the power to do all the rest.

Mr. BLAINE. Under the clause as to regulating commerce between the States Congress has exercised powers directly looking to the public health, minutely directing the transportation of cattle, even entirely within one State. They have said how cattle shall be transported inside of Vermont, inside of Maine, inside of New York, if it be upon any line of railroad that forms part of a line leading into another State, and they have done that on the ground of the public health.

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Maine also that Congress has passed an act requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to make rules and regulations prohibiting the introduction or importation of adulterated drugs and medicines.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, and as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] suggests, obscene literature is also regulated; playing-cards I believe are a non-importable thing. But the trouble is that my honorable friend from Maine and my honorable friend from Tennessee do not attend to the distinction between the sovereign independence of these two jurisdictions for the objects to which they apply. So far as it does relate to commerce between the States as well as with foreign countries, the transportation of animals from State to State because they must always be in some State every moment of time—the moment they leave the border of one State they are in another and therefore they are always in a State,—there cannot be much doubt about the right of Congress to provide for that. But here you provide for a regulation of health per se. That has not anything to do with commerce in any proper sense of the term at all. The Senator from Mississippi puts it in the best possible way that it can be put. I admit, the strongest possible way, that this is only an adoption of State laws in order to get over the other difficulty that is suggested, and that it is just the same in legal effect as if Congress should here point out the specific acts that the State laws condemn and state them in this statute and say they are condemned. Now suppose Congress was to do that and taking the law of the State of New York, for instance, that every person infected with yellow fever or coming from a ship infected with yellow fever, when he has got within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be taken and carried to a hospital and restrained of his personal liberty; would that do? I do not think it would. If it would do, then you have an equal right to say—for the community on the whole is more interested in it—that every person found drunk should be picked up and carried to a hospital and held until he would disclose (as the State of Vermont provides that he shall in such a case) where he got his liquor.

Mr. BLAINE. That is not contagious.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am afraid it is. I am afraid it is more contagious than the yellow fever. It depends more on good fellowship and social conditions than yellow fever does, and I think you can stamp out yellow fever a hundred times where you would fail to stamp out the use of liquor. So the difficulty all arises, I think, with my honorable friend from Maine, in confounding these two things, in running these separate and independent jurisdictions together when under the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the several States they may come up to a point of contact but they cannot cross the boundary of either, and coming to this point of contact the act of 1799 said that the officers and agents of the United States should act in comity and harmony with the officers of that independent power, just as if it were a foreign state, in preserving intact the laws of health.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to say that in many respects I think the Senator from Vermont has made correct suggestions. I would not myself be willing by any vote of mine to recognize a power of legislation which was not conferred by the Constitution of the United States; and if I did not consider the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden as entirely covering the point contained in the first section of this bill, declaring that the Congress of the United States may adopt a quarantine regulation of a State and enforce it as a regulation of commerce, I do not see how I could vote for it. If that doctrine is not settled by that decision and made the law by the Constitution as thus finally interpreted, I have misunderstood the language of the Supreme Court. I think that result is very plainly deducible from the decision in Gibbons vs. Ogden, and that under it the provision in the first section of this bill which provides for a penalty upon any vessel violating this law and entering a port in violation of the quarantine laws of the State, is entirely consistent with the Constitution.

In regard to the analogy made by the Senator from Vermont of the election laws, I say that if there is any authority in the Constitution of the United States which enables Congress to pass those laws they could not be questioned in any respect; but the difference is this: the Supreme Court of the United States has decided the express point which the Senator has argued here in relation to the foreign commerce of this country that Congress may by law adopt the quarantine laws of the States in the different ports and enforce those laws; and it is not confined by the act of Congress to the mere personal aid of the officers, for if the United States can require their officers to aid in assisting the State laws they can also enforce them themselves. I rest the argument entirely on the principle that the United States may make a State quarantine law a regulation of commerce; and if that is not so, then the Supreme Court erred.

But I desire to say for myself that I would not in any respect by any vote of mine give a power over this subject which was not conferred by the Constitution. I will say further that if the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States had not extended the admiralty jurisdiction, which means the jurisdiction and power of the United States over the great rivers of this country; if it had not been decided that the internal commerce was within the control of Congress by a long series of decisions, there might be some question on this subject; but by the interpretations of the Constitution given by the Supreme Court of the United States the power and jurisdiction of this Government has been extended over the great national highways, over the Mississippi River, over the great lakes, over all the internal commerce of the States, and the power of the United States to regulate and control that commerce has been asserted and maintained both in respect to persons and in respect to goods. It has been again and again affirmed by the supreme judicial tribunal of the country. It is therefore no longer a question of argument; and the learned and very powerful distinctions which have been drawn by the learned Senator from Vermont, which have impressed me greatly, are not open questions and cannot be now brought before the Senate or the country for their consideration.

If the Congress of the United States can pass laws regulating commerce upon the great lakes and upon all the rivers both as to goods and as to persons, regulating the entrance of ports at the different towns upon all the great rivers passing through different States; if it includes, as the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden asserts, persons as well as property and all vessels engaged in the carrying trade, then these are no longer propositions for us to consider.

I agree with the learned Senator that I would never cast a vote to authorize any tribunal of the United States to enforce any State law or to impose penalties for its violation. I certainly think with him that his argument is conclusive on that subject; and it is only in cases where the Constitution has given to Congress the power to legislate that it may adopt the State law or re-enact it. And even then I will agree with the learned Senator that it is a highly inexpedient mode of legislation to adopt by general terms the legislation of a State, although Congress may have that subject entirely within its power. But, sir, if it had not been an adjudicated matter, as I consider it, if the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden had not settled these points, especially in regard to the foreign commerce of the country, conclusively, I should think that there was great ground for weighing the opinions of the learned Senator which have been so forcibly and so admirably put before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment in the Senate. If no amendment be offered, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. HOAR. What became of the amendment which I moved some time ago to the third section, to insert the word "additional" before "rules and regulations?" Was that adopted?

Mr. ALLISON. It shared the fate of all the other amendments.

Mr. HOAR. Has it been voted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that he would offer it.

Mr. HOAR. I offered it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary did not understand that it was actually offered.

Mr. HOAR. It is of no consequence. It can be offered now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator offers it now?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is, in line 22 of section 3, after the word "such," to insert "additional;" so as to read:

> The National Board of Health shall report the facts to the President of the United States, who shall, if, in his judgment, it is necessary and proper, order said Board of Health to make such additional rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States, &c.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] is unavoidably absent. He is in favor of this bill. If he be deemed paired upon this vote with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] I shall feel at liberty to vote. If, on the contrary, some other Senator is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, I am paired with the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] told me this morning that he would not be able to be in the Senate to-day and that the Senator from New York who now is on the floor would pair with him on the passage of this bill. He stated to me that he was paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] upon all political questions. He did not regard this as a political question.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not so regard it. Therefore I shall deem myself paired with the Senator from Indiana although I understood from the Senator from Wisconsin before he went away that he deemed himself paired with the Senator from Indiana upon all questions on which they would vote on opposite sides; and knowing the views of the Senator from Wisconsin as far as I do, upon the constitutional questions involved in this bill, I have very little doubt that he would vote against it; but I will consider myself paired with the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT,] who is temporarily absent from the Senate Chamber. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) I believe I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] on this question. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon all political questions with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I do not regard the consideration of this bill as coming within the list of political matters, and I shall vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have very great doubts as to how I ought to vote on this bill, but I solve the doubts in favor of a measure which is calculated to prevent disease. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 12; as follows:

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, ETC.

Mr. BEALE. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill simply in order that it may be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. CONGER. Not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that no bill referred by unanimous consent shall come back.

Mr. CONGER. I thought that applied to Monday only.

The SPEAKER. It applies to all days; but where bills come from committees by unanimous consent it is necessary to make that stipulation.

Mr. BEALE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2014) to provide for the welfare of the people in preventing the adulteration of articles of food and drink; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and ordered to be printed.

JENNIE K. MOORE.

Mr. WILSON. As I was not here on the last bill day I ask unanimous consent to offer some bills and resolutions.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2015) for the relief of Jennie K. Moore; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SOUTHERN POSTAL AND COMMERCIAL ROUTE.

Mr. WILSON (by request) also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 73) providing for survey and report under the supervision of the War Department of the best route for postal and commercial purposes from western point of railroad termination in Texas to the Gulf of California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON. I send to the desk another resolution and ask its present consideration. I think every gentleman will agree to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the honorable Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House, at as early a day as practicable, a specified enumeration of the different trust funds in charge of himself, as Secretary, and of the Treasury Department, or any officer thereof, stating the original amount of each fund, when and on what account it was deposited, and how from time to time it was invested, together with the amount of interest earned or added, and such details not herein mentioned as will contribute to an understanding of the past and present conditions of said funds.

Mr. CONGER. What is the object of the gentleman from West Virginia in presenting this resolution?

Mr. WILSON. The object is to ascertain the state of the trust funds in the Treasury Department.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that. Does the gentleman present it for reference or for passage?

Mr. WILSON. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CONGER. If the House is prepared to furnish more clerks in the Department the resolution might be agreed to. If not, I must object to it.

SWAMP LANDS IN HUMBOLDT COUNTY, IOWA.

Mr. CARPENTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2016) to ratify and confirm an appropriation made by the county of Humboldt, in the State of Iowa, of the swamp and overflowed lands situated within the boundaries of said county to aid in the construction of a railroad in said county; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railroads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

HERBERT S. JENKINS.

Mr. VALENTINE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2017) for the relief of Herbert S. Jenkins, of Pawnee, Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I only present the bill for reference.

Mr. CONGER. I object, unless I know what it is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the title be read.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the reading.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report from the Committee on Appropriations the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Senate amendments.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendments will be read, and the gentleman from Tennessee will indicate what recommendation is made by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the report of the Committee on Appropriations be read.

The SPEAKER. The report does not accompany the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. While the report is being found—I thought it was in the bill—if the House will indulge me, I will say a word or two of explanation in regard to the amendments. In the first place, the Committee on Appropriations instructed me to move a concurrence in all of the amendments of the Senate. It is hardly necessary that I should give the reasons for that course. They are apparent. Under the circumstances the committee thought it best that they should recommend to the House to concur in the amendments.

There are some of the amendments that the committee would not recommend the House to concur in ordinarily.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman please state the general scope of the amendments?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir. For instance, the committee would not recommend the House to concur in the amendments to the bill providing for the salaries of the officers and employés of the Senate at the same rates now fixed by law, being from 20 to 100 per cent. higher in some instances than the salaries of the officers of the House of the same grade.

The entire amount embraced in the amendments is $94,509 in the way of increase. Forty-five thousand four hundred odd dollars of that amount consists of the increased salaries of the employés and officers of the Senate. There is one item of $20,000 of this $94,000 for the diplomatic and consular service, which was dropped out of the last consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, which has usually been in the bill and which was left out intentionally, but the Senate has added it as an amendment, it being asked for by the State Department as necessary to the foreign service.

They have also given to themselves two additional annual clerks of committees, one for the Committee on the Post-Offices and Post-Roads and one for the Committee on Military Affairs. Heretofore the clerks of these committees have been per diem clerks. They have increased the contingent fund of the Senate $3,000; they have passed an amendment providing for an appropriation of $5,000 for the purchase of works of art for the Library of Congress; they have increased the salary of the First Assistant Postmaster-General from $3,500 to $4,000; they have increased the salary of the chief of the Bureau of Statistics from $2,400 to $3,600; they have increased the force in the Patent Office by fourteen copyists and ten laborers; they have reduced the salaries provided in the House bill of the chief clerk of the Land Office, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office, and of the Pension Office from $2,250, as fixed by the House bill, down to the present law, which is $2,000; they have also added an amendment providing for the salary for an additional associate justice of the Supreme Court, amounting to $4,000. These are the money items embraced in the amendments.

Mr. DUNNELL. When the gentleman commenced he was not heard upon this side of the House. I do not myself understand whether the motion he made was a motion to concur in the amendments of the Senate or not.

Mr. ATKINS. I stated that I was instructed to make that motion.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, and it is whether the Senate has made any change or additions in any respect to what are known in the House as the political features of the bill?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir.

Mr. CONGER. They have made no changes in any respect?

Mr. ATKINS. None whatever.

The amendments of the Senate were then read.

Mr. ATKINS. I move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations one question.

Mr. ATKINS. I will hear the question.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is, whether the disparity between the compensation of the employés of the House and Senate in this bill is greater than in the existing law?

Mr. ATKINS. It is not; it is on the same basis. With regard to that, I will state that the Committee on Appropriations do not desire to be understood, in recommending a concurrence in these amendments, that they concur in the present salaries of the employés and officers of the Senate; they do not wish to be considered as committed to that basis as a permanent precedent, but for obvious reasons they felt that it was not proper at this time to longer delay the passage of this bill by resisting the views of the Senate on this subject. At a proper time in the future this subject will be taken up and considered by the Committee on Appropriations and I trust will be acted upon by the House.

I am assured also that there is a great probability of a concurrence between the House and Senate on this subject. Already a resolution has been introduced in the Senate looking to the equalization and adjustment of the pay of the officers and employés respectively of the House and Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the Senate adopted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] in regard to the payment of arrears of pensions?

Mr. ATKINS. They have adopted it.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that the Committee on Appropriations have reserved the right to pass upon the merits or demerits of any amendments made by the Senate, in which they have for the present recommended a concurrence?

Mr. ATKINS. I desired to be so understood; I tried to make that plain.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has nearly answered the inquiry I wish to make by what he has already said in reference to this action being considered as establishing no precedent for the future. I understand the gentleman to say now that, if the occasion should arise when the features of the Senate amendments to this bill to which he has referred shall again come before the House, the action of the House at this time in agreeing to the amendments of the Senate is not to be considered as binding for the future.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course not.

Mr. CONGER. I mean at this session of Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. That is the unanimous sentiment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McCOOK. Do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to say that, notwithstanding the Committee on Appropriations question the propriety of this increase made by the present economical and reform Senate, he reports the bill to the House and recommends concurrence in the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman understands that I have made the motion to concur. He can place such construction upon that as he chooses. I do not know that the question of the economy of the Senate is involved at this time; there are other questions to be considered now besides that of economy. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES OLIVIER DUCLOZEL.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty minutes before one o'clock. The unfinished business of last Friday, pending at the close of the morning hour, is the bill reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims (H. R. No. 2004) to confirm the title of Charles Olivier Duclozel to certain lands in the State of Louisiana. A point of order was pending when this bill was last under consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I made the point of order on Friday last, and said then what I thought it desirable to say. I am glad that opportunity has been given the Speaker to examine this question more fully, and I suppose he has done so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the point of order and the facts in the case.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say now, in addition to what I said the other day——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to object to remarks upon the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The point of order has been decided.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided the point of order. The Chair stated that he had examined the question. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is entitled to the floor upon the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I have examined the report of the committee but have not gone back and examined the laws referred to in that report, although on other occasions I have examined those laws and know what they are.

I feel satisfied from my reading of this report that the chain of title in this case from the Spanish government, I think it is, is imperfect by reason of the loss of title papers. If that be so, if the chain of evidence of title is incomplete, and a part of it necessary to show the title from either of the three governments in which the title of the soil was successively vested is gone, is lost, that may be unfortunate for the claimant, but it certainly leaves the property, so far as legal title is concerned, in the original holder.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. On the point of order?

Mr. BLOUNT. In regard to the facts the gentleman is stating.

Mr. CONGER. If he will allow me to take the report, a copy of which I see he has in his hand.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman states too much when he says that a part of the evidence of title has been lost. There is no evidence that such papers ever existed at all. There is a defect in the chain of title, but that defect does not consist in a loss of papers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is going into the merits of the case.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman stated just now that the title was imperfect by the reason of the loss of papers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that statement was made in the last debate upon this subject.

Mr. BLOUNT. The report itself discloses the fact that the defect of title does not consist of the loss of papers, but of inability to trace the chain of title.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] will allow me to take the paper which he showed me yesterday I will refer to that part of it upon which I base my remarks.

Mr. ACKLEN. Here is the paper.

Mr. CONGER, (examining the paper.) Instead of those facts to which I refer being contained in the report of the committee, they are contained in a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or rather to the Secretary of the Interior and by him submitted to the Speaker, dated June 3, 1874. In that letter the Commissioner says:

> The written title of evidence from the Spanish government upon which claim is based is alleged to be a grant made in 1775 to Barnard Danterive, the written evidence of which grant is now said to have been lost. The existence of such a grant, however, has not been proven, though it is evident that a large tract of land in the vicinity of the tract claimed by Duclozel was once in the possession of one Danterive.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is just what I stated.

Mr. CONGER. I now turn to the report of the committee. As I understand it, this is a simple question whether there is in the United States Government any interest whatever, either equitable or legal, reversionary or otherwise, in this land which the United States can by confirmation convey to anybody else. If there is, the bill is subject to the point of order.

Now, this report says that in the chain of title there are defects, but all such defects are prior to 1834. The report also says:

> The Commissioner of the General Land Office recommends that said title be not confirmed because there was not a complete chain of title from Danterive.

The most that is claimed in behalf of this bill is that the probabilities are so strong of there having been once a title that the United States ought to confirm it just as under the law if the evidence had been sufficient the grant would have been confirmed. I read from the report:

> Had the present claimant shown actual corporeal possession of the tract claimed, from the date of his purchase, 1836, it would, in my opinion, in connection with the documents filed, have given him an equitable claim upon Congress for relief.

Now, the legal title is in the United States; it never has passed from the United States. The legal title and a patent follow any admission of a claim to title. Now, if this Government confirms the title of this applicant, then a patent follows and the legal title is conveyed. I think it is plain that, whatever the equities may be, there is some title to be conveyed or sought to be conveyed or released from the United States. I take the report itself. It is evidence that the relief claimed is a release of any claim which the United States may equitably have in presenti or in reversion to this land, to be followed necessarily by a patent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] on the particular point which is stated to be contained in the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, written in 1874, wherein it is stated on behalf of the Government that there exists no proof of a grant from Spain to this individual in 1775.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the clause to which the gentleman refers as contained in that letter is not all that the letter contains. The Commissioner expressly says:

> Had the present claimant shown actual corporeal possession of the tract claimed, from the date of his purchase in 1836, it would, in my opinion, in connection with the documents filed, have given him an equitable claim upon Congress for relief, notwithstanding he had failed to complete all the links in his chain of title.

Now, the remark that he had failed to complete all the links in his chain of title is further explained in this way: it is shown in all these proceedings at the Land Office and in these letters that two title papers have been lost; that there was in fact, as I understand all this proof taken together, an original grant in 1775 by Spain to a man named Danterive of a parcel embracing as a part the land now in question. Every parcel of the original tract has been confirmed in the claimants except this little parcel now in controversy—a little more than one hundred acres.

Now I make this point: suppose that Spain had never ceded this territory to France, nor France to the United States; suppose further the fact to exist, which does exist, that two title papers connected with the original grant to Danterive have been lost. The Spanish government, upon these facts being shown, would confirm the title to this grantee; it could not do otherwise. The United States could take nothing that Spain had not to grant when it ceded the territory to France. France could not give to the United States what it did not have to grant; and the fact being shown that there was a grant, though the mere title papers had been lost, it would be incumbent on the Government of the United States to do what Spain would have done in the event of loss of title papers—to confirm the title in its own grantee. The Government of the United States has no claim to this tract of land.

The SPEAKER. It is plain to the mind of the Chair that under the rule he is not authorized to inquire into the motives which prompt the introduction of this class of legislation, nor into the purposes which it is expected to accomplish. He is confined in his examination to the face of the bill, and must rule only on the parliamentary law. In this instance, however, there is a dispute as to the facts. One set of facts alleged to be true would subject this bill to the point of order; if the other set of facts as alleged be true, then the bill is not subject to a point of order. It appears that the Spanish grant to this individual was made in 1775. The grant from Spain to France was, the Chair thinks, about 1802; but the grant from France to the United States, subject to the prior grant to this individual by Spain, was in 1803.

It is further stated in a letter written in 1874 by an officer of this Government, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that there was then no proof of the existence of a grant from the Spanish government to this individual in 1775 as alleged. In view of the conflicting statements as to matters of fact, it being claimed on the one side that the United States has not now and never has had title of any sort to this land, the Chair of course feels in duty bound to conform his decision to the safe side and to regard as paramount the interests of the Government. He makes this decision with less reluctance as regards the individual claims involved, for the reason that no hardship can result from such a ruling upon this bill; because immediately after the morning hour to-day has expired the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill will be in order; and as the Chair is informed there is but one bill now pending in the committee. The Chair therefore, giving the benefit of the doubt to the Government, rules that the bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole. It will be so referred.

COMMODORE J. W. A. NICHOLSON.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back without amendment, and with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 70) authorizing Commodore J. W. A. Nicholson, United States Navy, to accept from his Catholic majesty the King of Spain the Grand Cross of Naval Merit.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes J. W. A. Nicholson, of the United States Navy, to accept the Grand Cross of Naval Merit, with a white badge, tendered him by his Catholic majesty the King of Spain, as a mark of his majesty's appreciation of the services rendered to the officers and crew of the wrecked war-ship Pizarro, belonging to her Catholic majesty's navy.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is there a report accompanying this joint resolution?

Mr. COX. There is a report. It is a companion bill with that passed on the last private bill day in reference to services rendered by our naval vessels to the Spanish war-ship Pizarro when wrecked. It is a testimonial from Spain to our officers for their kindness and assistance. I ask the joint resolution be put on its passage.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from New York, who is familiar with these ornamental things, to state to this House what the order or honor conferred consists of.

Mr. COX. It is a decoration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. COX. The report is rather long, and I will state the facts in a few minutes. It is a simple decoration from the marine office in Madrid to those who assist ships which are wrecked on the sea. We have about the same thing in our Department of State where we give medals and chronometers from a general fund.

Mr. CONGER. That is satisfactory.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be printed.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

STATEMENT OF COMMODORE NICHOLSON.

The Spanish man-of-war Pizarro on her voyage from Cuba to Spain foundered in mid-ocean. Her officers and crew were saved by a passing vessel with only the clothes they stood in, brought to the Delaware breakwater, and were thence, by order of the Treasury Department, despatched to this port by a revenue-cutter, where they arrived on the 21st of September. Several were quite sick and all were in a deplorable condition for want of clothing, &c.

By my orders, on their arrival, all, both officers and crew, were received on board of the flag-ship Colorado, and clothing and food were issued them and the sick sent to the naval hospital. I visited the ship in person and saw that they were properly cared for and were comfortable.

They remained on board from the 21st September until the 3d October, when, arrangements having been made by the Spanish government, they were sent to Cuba.

This prompt action of mine was subsequently approved by letter from the Navy Department, of which the following is a copy:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 23, 1878.

SIR: Your telegram of the 21st instant, stating that at the request of the Spanish minister you have sent on board the receiving-ship Colorado the crew of the ship-wrecked Spanish man-of war Pizarro, and that you shall keep them till arrangements can be made for sending them to Spain, has been received. Your action is approved.

Very respectfully,

R. W. SHUFELDT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Commodore J. W. A. NICHOLSON,
United States Navy, Commandant Navy-Yard, New York.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 20, 1878.

SIR: I transmit herewith a copy of a letter from the honorable Secretary of State, dated the 4th instant, in reference to the services rendered by you to the officers and crew of the wrecked vessel Pizarro of His Catholic Majesty's navy.

Very respectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Commodore J. W. A. NICHOLSON,
Commandant Navy-Yard, New York.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 4, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that a dispatch has been received from the minister of the United States at Madrid, alluding to the agreeable impression created there by the humanity shown in this country to the officers and crew of the wrecked Spanish vessel Pizarro, and conveying the desire of his Catholic Majesty to confer on Commodore Nicholson, commanding at the Brooklyn navy-yard, as a mark of his royal appreciation of the services rendered by that officer to his subjects on board that vessel, "the Grand Cross of Naval Merit, with a white badge."

Observing that the minister of the United States took occasion to explain to the Spanish minister of foreign affairs that no officer of the United States could accept such decorations without leave first granted by a special act of Congress,

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS.

Hon. R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

MOTHER OF GENERAL W. A. C. RYAN.

Mr. COX. I am also directed by the same committee to report back favorably a joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) authorizing the payment of a portion of the Virginius indemnity fund to the mother of General W. A. C. Ryan.

The resolution, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of State to pay to Mrs. Eliza Dunne, the mother of General W. A. C. Ryan, the pro rata of the indemnity fund paid by the Government of Spain, on account of the murder of the officers and crew of the steamer Virginius, at Santiago de Cuba, November 4, 1873, to which she would be entitled on account of the death of her son if the citizenship of the said General Ryan were clearly established.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the accompanying report, and then I have a point of order which I desire to make on this bill.

Mr. COX. Let the report be read; but I will state to the gentleman from Michigan there is no difficulty about paying this money to the mother of General Ryan but one: since his death his final naturalization papers cannot be found. The Secretary of State recommends, inasmuch as they have found his declaration of intention, and as this fund was set apart for him in part pro rata, that the State Department be allowed to take the testimony on file as to his citizenship.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a wife, or are there other heirs?

Mr. COX. No wife or heirs. The mother of this man lives in Chicago in very needy circumstances. The money was set apart for him and the only difficulty is in establishing his final naturalization papers.

Mr. MAGINNIS. This man served bravely during the war.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman from Michigan will permit me I will say a few words on this proposition. It is not known whether there is a wife or heirs and this bill only authorizes the mother to receive what she would have received provided he had been a citizen. If he had been a citizen her rights would have been settled as between her and the wife and heirs. This only puts her on that footing. If she is not entitled to anything she will not get anything.

Mr. COX. There is no doubt he was a citizen, for as the Delegate from Montana has stated he served in our Army valiantly.

Mr. ROBESON. It would give her no rights she would not have.

Mr. CONGER. My only purpose was to ascertain whether there were other persons whose interests ought to be properly considered.

Mr. COX. None at all. This sum is put down against the name of Ryan for his mother, and there only lacks this testimony as to citizenship.

Mr. SPRINGER. He came to this country when he was only fifteen years of age, served during the entire war as a private and officer of the United States Army, and then removed to Montana Territory and became a citizen and officer under the territorial government as the Delegate from that Territory well knows.

Mr. CONGER. His meritorious services, however, should not prevent, if he had a wife and children, our doing them justice.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no wife or children.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Of course if the Government owes this money it ought to go to the proper party, and if there is a wife living, as to which my friend from New Jersey seems to have some doubt, that contingency should be provided for. It is barely possible if we pay now to this party we may be paying to the wrong party.

Mr. ROBESON. We do not pay to this party. We only say this party shall receive it provided she is entitled to it.

Mr. COX. There is no wife or child, and the name of General Ryan's mother is put down on the list.

Mr. CONGER. Let us have the report read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House joint resolution No. 55, "authorizing the payment of a portion of the Virginius indemnity fund to the mother of General W. A. C. Ryan," having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report the same back with a recommendation that it pass.

Your committee find that General Ryan was born in Canada in 1843, and became a resident of the State of New York at the age of fifteen years. His father died in Canada in 1851. His mother is a resident of the city of Chicago and a widow of advanced years, greatly in need of the relief which the passage of this joint resolution would afford her. Her son, General Ryan, entered the Union Army in June, 1862, as a private in Company G, One hundred and thirty-second Regiment New York Infantry. He was engaged in many of the hard-fought battles of the late war and was wounded several times, and, through several promotions for gallant conduct, was mustered out at the close of the war as captain of One hundred and ninety-second New York Volunteers, receiving an honorable discharge. He then went to Montana Territory, where he served as a grand juror in a United States court, and conducted himself in all respects as a citizen of the United States. He was one of the unfortunate victims of the massacre of the officers and crew of the steamer Virginius at Santiago de Cuba, November 4, 1873. The Government of the United States demanded an indemnity of the government of Spain on account of the massacre of American citizens on board the Virginius, which was afterward paid. The fund has been partially disbursed and is still held subject to the claims of the representatives of such American citizens as lost their lives at that time. The citizenship of General Ryan has not been proven by record evidence of his naturalization, for the reason that his surviving representatives do not know where to obtain such record evidence. But your committee are of the opinion that he was a citizen of the United States, and that as such his mother is entitled to receive the pro rata share to which she would be entitled if the record evidence of the fact of citizenship were supplied. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying joint resolution.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. COX. The passage of the joint resolution is recommended by the State Department. I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT Z. L. TANNER.

Mr. COX also, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 60) authorizing Lieutenant Z. L. Tanner, of the United States Navy, to accept a pair of flower-vases and a lacquered box from the Japanese government.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes Lieutenant Z. L. Tanner, of the United States Navy, to accept a pair of flower-vases and a lacquered box, presented to him by the Japanese government in acknowledgment of his services in rescuing four Japanese seamen from the foundered Japanese schooner Hisagoshi Maru, on the 19th day of January, 1877.

Mr. COX. This testimonial from the Japanese government was for the service of Lieutenant Tanner, of the United States Navy. When he was commander of the Pacific steamship City of Peking he rescued a number of Japanese seamen from a wreck in the Pacific Ocean in January, 1877. The government of Japan, following the example of other governments, has tendered a testimonial for this service. I have the papers here and ask that they be read. The first is a letter from the legation of Japan to the Secretary of State.

Several MEMBERS. Let them be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. Very well. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONGER. Has the gentleman from New York seen these flower-pots?

Mr. COX. I have not had that honor. When I find out where they are, I will tender to my friend from Michigan an invitation to come and see them.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the joint resolution, there were ayes 120, noes not counted.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The papers ordered to be printed in the RECORD are as follows:

In recognition of his services, a pair of flower vases and a lacquer box were sent directly to Lieutenant Tanner, through the Japanese consul in New York, and I cannot but hope that Congress will pass a resolution authorizing him to accept the presents.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.

L. Tanner, of the United States Navy, late commander of the Pacific Mail steamship City of Peking, for his services in rescuing four Japanese seamen from a wreck in the Pacific Ocean, in January, 1877, and expressing a hope that a resolution may be passed by Congress authorizing Lieutenant Tanner to accept in recognition of the service referred to a pair of flower vases and a lacquer box, which were sent to him through the Japanese consul at New York.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS.

PENSIONS.

Mr. DIBRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 703) to prevent the withholding of pensions from pensioners under the act of March 9, 1878.

Mr. BREWER. That is a public bill, and not in order under this call.

Mr. DIBRELL. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan that while this is a public bill and general in its nature it only applies to a few individuals. It applies only to a dozen or two dozen pensioners. I ask that the bill and the report be read.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. CONGER. That bill is the amendment of a general law, and is general legislation. I ask if the gentleman by this bill wishes to restore to the pension-rolls those whose names were stricken off on account of disloyalty?

Mr. DIBRELL. That is the object.

Mr. CONGER. Then it would be just as well to bring that up right square. The object is hidden here a great way down.

Mr. DIBRELL. It is not hidden. It is as plain as can be.

Mr. CONGER. No one would suspect it from the reading of the bill, unless he knew otherwise what the effect would be.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on the point of order that this is a public bill?

Mr. CONGER. I do.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that the bill go on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan object to the bill going on the Calendar?

Mr. CONGER. I do not see how it can go on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made that the bill cannot be reported, it cannot go on the Calendar.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

Mr. COFFROTH. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, in order that the bill may be printed and recommitted, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I object. This is a public bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Have the soldiers got no friends on the other side of the House?

Mr. WHITE. Not Mexican soldiers. As regards Union soldiers, they have friends enough here. I had the honor to fight that bill all through last Congress.

TITLE TO MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. ARMFIELD, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1280) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, relating to suits at law affecting titles to mining claims.

The bill was read.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is not that a public bill?

The SPEAKER. It is. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to its being reported at this time.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection and allow the bill to pass.

Mr. DUNNELL. I must object to the introduction of public bills to-day.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] to withdraw his objection and allow the bill to be considered at this time. It is a very meritorious bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I must decline to do so.

HENRY VOELTER.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House with a copy of the reports of the examiner and commissioner on the case of the extension of the patent of Henry Voelter for making wood paper pulp under a special act of Congress, dated March 3, 1877.

Mr. VANCE. If there is no objection, and I suppose there will be none, for it merely calls for information, I will ask that the resolution be adopted now.

The question was taken; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. VANCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DANIEL M. COOK.

Mr. WARD, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 342 a bill (H. R. No. 2019) for the relief of Daniel M. Cook.

The substitute was read. It authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to hear and determine the application of Daniel M. Cook for the extension for the further term of seven years of letters-patent for improvement in processes and apparatus for evaporating and desiccating cane-juice, originally granted June 22, 1868, as No. 2063, reissued December 10, 1859, as No. 867, and extended for seven years from and after the 22d day of June, 1872, and again reissued July 23, 1878; the form of such application and the mode of proceedings entered into to be in all respects the same as was provided by the act of Congress approved July 8, 1870, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statute relating to patents and copyrights, for the extension of patents granted prior to March 2, 1861;" and if upon such hearing the Commissioner of Patents shall be satisfied that the said Daniel M. Cook has failed to obtain from the use or sale of his invention or discovery a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon it and the introduction of it into use, and that it is just and proper, having due regard to the public interest, that the term of the patent should be extended, the said Commissioner shall make a certificate upon said reissued patent renewing and extending the same to Daniel M. Cook, his executors, administrators, or assigns for the term of seven years from the 22d day of June, A. D. 1879, which will be recorded in the Patent Office, and thereupon said patent shall have the same effect in law as if it had been originally patented for twenty-eight years; provided, that no suit shall be maintained for any infringement of this patent made prior to the passage of this act except upon proof of actual knowledge of said patent on the part of the person or persons so infringing and for the continued use by any person or persons of any apparatus or process covered by said patent and purchased prior to the passage hereof.

Mr. WARD. This bill was before the last Congress and received a unanimous report in its favor both from the Committee on Patents of the Senate and from the Committee on Patents of this House. So far as I know, there is no objection to it from any member of the present Committee on Patents. It is a bill that the committee consider is called for by the demands of justice as well as an act of charity to a man who has suffered during a period of twenty years by reason of a mistake made by officers of the Government at the time the original patent was granted. There is a report accompanying the bill, and I shall be very glad to answer any questions that gentlemen desire to ask.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARD. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE. Has this man enjoyed the fruits of the sale of his patent within the limitations provided by law?

Mr. WARD. He has enjoyed the fruits of his invention for only a year out of the twenty-one years for which the patent has been running.

Mr. BROWNE. What has prevented it?

Mr. WARD. A mistake of the Patent Office, which was not corrected until after this man had suffered by years of litigation and become almost impoverished. He was a farmer in the State of Ohio, not acquainted with the forms of proceedings in the Patent Office, and supposed that he was obliged to take whatever the officers of the Government chose to give him in the shape of a patent. He took the defective patent given him and used his best endeavors to introduce it to the public, but was met by infringements, brought into litigation, and after going through the courts and spending all he had in the world the court at last decided in his favor and that the Patent Office was in the wrong. A year ago the Patent Office corrected its mistake and gave this man a patent covering the whole of his invention.

Mr. BROWNE. Upon principle I am opposed to extending patent monopolies and I arose just now with the intention of objecting to the consideration of this bill. The explanation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WARD] has satisfied me and I will not interpose any objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague from the Cincinnati district, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH,] who is not now in the city, before he left especially requested me to look at the papers in this case. I know nothing about the case except from having read the reports of the last Congress and of this Congress.

While I am on record in almost every case that has been before the House for years against the extension of patents, it is perfectly clear to my mind that this is a case where we ought to depart from our original rule. I will make a single statement of what will control my judgment in this case.

This citizen, an intelligent farmer, but without much knowledge of law, made a novel and valuable invention in regard to the refining of sugar. His invention consisted of two things: a new process and a new machine embodying that process. The Patent Office refused his application for a patent for the process and gave him a patent only for the machine.

The consequence was that infringers, by making a little different form of machine, but involving the same principle and embodying his process, broke into his business everywhere. It was not until at the end of a long series of litigations that, about one year ago, the court decided that the Patent Office had erred in not granting him a patent for the process as well as for the machine. Had the Patent Office so done in the first place this inventor would have been protected all the time against litigation. When this finding of the court was made he went to the Patent Office and asked for a patent for the machine, obtained it, and has had about a year to enjoy the benefits of that patent.

The Government through its officers having made the mistake which has prevented this man from enjoying the fruits of his invention, it is only fair that such mistakes should be corrected by our allowing this extension.

Mr. SPARKS. When did this man obtain his original patent?

Mr. GARFIELD. In 1858. The result of the matter as it now stands is that this man has spent all his means in defending his patent because of an error in the office, and obtained the proper form of patent only about a year before it expired.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report has been called for.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not long. This bill only gives about seven years' extension.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to say that this bill leaves the matter wholly discretionary with the Commissioner of Patents. If after re-examination he thinks this party has not received a sufficient remuneration for his invention, the Commissioner will grant a reissue. We do not extend the patent directly, but leave the matter discretionary with the Commissioner.

Mr. GARFIELD. The decision of the court will protect the man now.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee find in the present bill an exceptional case from the general class of applications for extensions of patents.

The circumstances here are unusual and appeal strongly to our sense of justice. The facts disclosed are substantially as follows:

D. M. Cook, the party for whom relief is asked, was a farmer in Mansfield, Ohio. In the course of his agricultural pursuits he invented an apparatus and process for evaporating sugar, or rather for defecating and concentrating sugar juices.

On June 22, 1858, he applied for his original patent, and finding it insufficient, surrendered it and applied for a reissue, which he obtained on December 19, 1859.

In both of these applications and the claims accompanying them Cook endeavored to obtain a patent for the process as well as the apparatus.

The Commissioner of Patents decided as follows: "You cannot be allowed in the one application a claim to the apparatus and a claim for the process also."

This decision was wrong, as will appear from the facts hereafter detailed; and that error of the Commissioner of Patents, the officer of the United States, cost Cook years of litigation, and was an act of great injustice, with very disastrous consequences to him. It is for the purpose of endeavoring, in some degree, to repair the wrong done by this Government official that the committee discover the great merit in this case.

The process which was refused by the Commissioner was the essential and valuable part of Cook's invention. However, he struggled on with his patent, that only half protected him. He labored industriously to perfect his apparatus and extend its advantages throughout the country and beyond its limits. That he did have an invention which was of real value is attested by numerous affidavits, but extracts from a few will be sufficient.

Horace Norton testifies as follows:

"Affiant further says he had charge of the experiments made at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, for the development of the invention from the capacity of a hogshead of sugar per day up to several hogsheads; that after a series of experiments costing about $2,500 the invention was developed to a capacity of about four to five hogsheads per day. After that, in subsequent years, these experiments were continued elsewhere, in most of which affiant participated, until the evaporator was extended to a capacity of eight to ten hogsheads per day. As the evaporator increased in size the experiments became correspondingly expensive.

"As fuel on the sugar plantations is now becoming scarce, it is becoming almost a necessity to fit the sugar-making appliances for the use of coal as a fuel, a somewhat difficult problem, owing to the little flame produced and difference in draft, &c. In the opinion of affiant, this Cook process can, if the patents are extended so as to make it an object to the inventor, be developed for the use of coal, and at the same time can be extended to the requirements of the largest planters."

A report of the officers of the Louisiana State Fair Association gives the result of experiments at an exhibition held at Baton Rouge, in January, 1868. The following is an extract:

"The facilities for making sugar economically and expeditiously are thus brought within the means of every person who desires to engage in the business, and we heartily commend the Cook sugar evaporator to the attention of the small planters of Louisiana and the adjacent States."

John I. Barrows, a sugar planter of Bayou Sara, Louisiana, under date of January 13, 1871, gives practical testimony to the economy of the invention in the following words:

"10. As compared with kettle trains, the cost of building furnace and setting the pan is about one-third as much. The cost of labor in working is about one-third less, and the amount of fuel required not more than half as much.

"11. I used the kettle trains since 1865, and from a careful comparison of the work of this with that of the former years I am entirely satisfied with my experiment, and can recommend the evaporator as economical in labor and fuel, more easy and satisfactory in its working, and more profitable in its results than the kettle process."

The testimonials to the same effect are very numerous, and the great advantage to the public, and economy of Cook's invention are established.

As soon as these qualities became known infringers sprang up on every side. Mr. Cook not only spent his years and means in honestly and industriously perfecting this invention, but during the same time he was plunged in a war of litigation to defend his rights. Individuals and combinations, with ample means and the best legal talent that money could procure, assailed the unlettered and almost impoverished farmer to dispossess him of the invention that had sprung from the practical ideas gathered in his own fields, and that he had spent so many years of patient effort to develop.

In June, 1878, the determination of one of these suits in which the representatives of the Cook patent were complainants, and the principal infringers defendants, and which was a test case, was reached by a final decree of Judge Drummond, of the United States circuit court for Indiana. The decree does not give the reasons for the decision, except that the court found "the equity of the cause to be with the defendants."

But from papers and affidavits submitted, it appears that the decree was made brief because the judge was compelled by ill-health to retire for a time from the bench to seek relaxation in travel. These papers also disclose the important fact that the failure of complainants to recover was because the Commissioner of Patents had refused to grant the essential quality of the patent as claimed.

Cook accordingly immediately applied for a reissue, claiming again the invention as for a process, and the Patent Office, on July 23, 1878, reissued the patent, allowing claims as follows:

"1. The within-described process of defecation and concentrating raw sugar-juices by passing the same in a moving body through an open evaporating-pan exposed to the direct action of the fire, substantially as and for the purpose described.

"2. An evaporating-pan furnished with transverse ledges in combination with a fire-furnace, a portion of the bottom surface of the pan near each side being unexposed to the direct heat of the furnace, so that while the intermediate surface of the bottom of the pan is intensely heated, the other portions remain comparatively cool, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"3. In combination with an evaporator-pan for evaporating a moving body of liquid, means, substantially as described, for elevating or depressing either end of the pan to regulate the flow of the liquid through the same, as set forth.

"4. An evaporating apparatus, which allows of a circulation of the stream of sirup, boils it at the center of the pan and cools it at the sides of the same, and affords facilities for regulating the flow of the stream, substantially as and for the purposes set forth.

"5. The combination in an evaporating-pan of the sheet-metal bottom A′ and the wooden sides, substantially as and for the purposes described.

"6. In combination with an open evaporating-pan, having transverse ledges arranged across the line of draught of the frame of the furnace, and capable of receiving a greater or less inclination, for the purpose of regulating the flow of the juices through it, a furnace of less width than the pan, substantially as and for the purposes described."

It is thus seen that, by mistake of the United States Patent Office, Mr. Cook, although the inventor of a valuable process for making sugar out of cane-juice, has been only allowed protection for that invention by patent for less than one year.

A careful examination of his actual receipts and expenditures shows he has received about $15,000 above expenses during the twenty years. This sum does not include any allowance whatever for personal services, efforts, or time.

Mr. Cook is now over fifty years old, in infirm health, with a wife and family dependent upon him, and very poor, his farm having been recently sold under foreclosure of mortgage, according to the testimony.

The evidence shows that through years of hardships, trials, and sickness he made the fight to maintain his rights, and the compensation he received is totally inadequate in view of these facts and of the value of the invention.

As the loss of adequate compensation may be clearly traced to the mistake of the Patent Office, the committee are of opinion that Cook is equitably entitled to the relief asked for, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. WARD. I now call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This bill will go over until the morning hour of next Friday.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the bill (H. R. No. 1377) to amend section 5440 of the Revised Statutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ACKLEN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 68.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SPARKS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ACKLEN and Mr. WARNER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 73, noes 91.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. WHITE said: I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 28; less than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. CONGER. I call for a count on the other side.

Mr. WHITE. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, only eight members rising.

The SPEAKER. A count of the other side on ordering the yeas and nays was demanded.

The count being completed, the result was announced—ayes 28, noes 109.

So (one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 75, nays 132, not voting 78; as follows:

Mr. WARNER moved, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. ACKLEN objected.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

DON CARLOS BUELL.

On motion of Mr. McKENZIE, by unanimous consent, a resolution to print the report of the military commission in the case of Major-General Don Carlos Buell was received, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION, AUSTRALIA.

Mr. MORTON. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a joint resolution relating to the representation of the United States to the industrial exhibition to be held at Melbourne, Australia, during the coming year.

Mr. McMAHON. I must object to that for the present.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the last vote as an indication of the wish on the part of the House to proceed with the consideration of public business, and therefore the House will proceed to consider the unfinished business coming over from yesterday.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. My point of order is that on Friday the House cannot change the order of business unless by a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has frequently overruled this point of order as stated. The gentleman had better read Rule 128.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. It is under that very rule I have made my point of order. If the Chair will refer to the note to that rule he will see that "under the rule of 26th April, 1828, relative to a postponement or change of the order of business it has been decided that it takes two-thirds to proceed to public business on Friday and Saturday."

The SPEAKER. The Chair has frequently ruled at former sessions on the point as stated. The rule states that "Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House." The Chair rules that that does not mean two-thirds, but a majority.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Let me inquire whether the House has passed on that question as stated in the Manual?

The SPEAKER. The House to-day has had an opportunity in the morning hour of transacting the private business provided for on Friday so far as that hour is concerned; but the House has absolutely refused by a yea-and-nay vote to go further with private business to-day. Of course that vote indicates clearly the wish of the House to go on with public business, and the Chair conforms thereto.

Mr. WARNER. Regular order of business!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the bill coming over from yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes. On the eighth section as amended the yeas and nays have been ordered. The pending question is to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. WHITE. I made the motion to reconsider, and my purpose was, as there was a manifest mistake in one of the amendments, to have it corrected. Such being the case, I shall vote against the motion to lay upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that during the confusion yesterday there was much uncertainty as to what did occur.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made the point of order that the previous question having been partly executed, it was not competent at that time to move a reconsideration, and referred to the Manual. The Chair has examined the history of that decision contained in the Manual, and finds it occurred in the Thirty-first Congress, first session, when the House was presided over by a gentleman elected by a plurality vote; that during that session of Congress on the 12th of February, 1850, the question was raised, and the then Speaker, Mr. Howell Cobb, decided the point that a motion to reconsider a vote by which the previous question was ordered was admissible, and the House did not dissent therefrom. Subsequently, on the 8th of July following, the same Speaker made the same decision, and referred to the fact that he had without dispute made that decision on the said 12th of February. An appeal, however, was made from the decision, and by a vote of 99 to 101 the House reversed it; and that is the origin of the practice since prevailing of denying the right of a reconsideration of a vote by which the main question was ordered during its execution.

Later in the same session, namely, on September 5, 1850, the question again arose, and the then Speaker decided it in accordance with what the House had determined and at variance with his own judgment, as stated when he was overruled by the House. Even that decision was appealed from; so that the Speaker had decided both ways, and both times his decision was appealed from. But the latter appeal was laid upon the table. Thence sprung up the practice which is stated in the Manual that the previous question could not be interrupted if it was partially executed. The Chair has always adhered to that. And had the Chair on yesterday known that the previous question prevailed on the section and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] he would not have admitted a vote on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOUNSBERY] to strike out the whole section pending execution of order for previous question. The truth is, a refusal on the part of the House to strike out the whole section was really equivalent to an affirmative vote approving of the section as amended; and the Chair then would have been compelled to decide that the previous question was exhausted. But the Chair is unwilling to allow a decision to go which was based upon misinformation. He therefore desires that the House may vacate the proceeding and may vote on the section as amended. The adoption of the section will relieve it of the operation of the previous question. It will then be competent for any gentleman who voted in the majority on that section as amended to move its reconsideration; and in that way the previous question is exhausted and the House will come intelligently to a stage where it can correct its own mistakes in amendment in phraseology or in purport.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope for the sake of the uniformity of our rulings from the Chair, and as no advantage can be taken of what the Chair now suggests, that that will be done; for I am quite sure if the Speaker had remembered all the steps which had been taken he would not have overruled the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair certainly would not. The gentleman will recollect that it is always a pleasure to the Chair to correct the least error he may have committed. The Chair was governed in his action by disjointed reports read at the desk from the RECORD which, when considered together, seemed to support the view the Chair then took.

Mr. GARFIELD. I can understand very well how in the hubbub here and mixture of affairs it was difficult to understand exactly the status of the case. The suggestion of the Chair will help every one to the enjoyment of his rights. As I understand, we would still retain our rights when any proposition is made to amend to raise the point of order on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. That would be the gentleman's right. The Chair will now submit the question on what he considers the proper mode to remedy the mistakes made by the House.

Mr. EWING. I wish to make a suggestion. Perhaps the House would unanimously consent to take a vote on the amendment proposed.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have not got to that stage yet.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on agreeing to the section as amended. When that is done the Chair will then indicate how the remedy can be applied as regards the correction of the phraseology of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.]

The question being taken, the section as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The section is now relieved from the operation of the previous question, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] moves to reconsider the vote by which that section as amended was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask consent that the order of yesterday of the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider be vacated.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] is now in order to move a modification.

Mr. EWING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "silver dollars" and insert "coin of the same metal."

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is not in order because it proposes to strike out words which the House has by a vote inserted. I refer the Chair to the ruling in the Manual on that point.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] a question about his amendment. I understand the effect of it to be this: if a party deposits gold bullion he receives a certificate which can only be satisfied in gold; if he deposits silver bullion he gets a certificate which may be satisfied by the return of silver bullion. Am I correct in understanding that to be the effect of the amendment?

Mr. EWING. That is not the effect of the proposed amendment. It is for the purpose of removing this incongruity——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he had better move first to strike out.

Mr. EWING. Very well; I move to strike out the words I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. That escapes the point of order. The Chair will have the rule read.

Mr. REED. I would like to inquire what the last action of the House was?

The SPEAKER. There has been no action on this question, and the Chair thought the House had better hear the rule read. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made the point of order and the Chair made a suggestion by which the point of order might be, as the Chair thinks, avoided by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.]

The Clerk read Rule 46, as follows:

Any member may call for the division of a question, before or after the main question is ordered, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to strike out is lost, the section will then be open to the amendment which the gentleman desires.

Mr. EWING. Allow me a moment to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the Chair ruled on my point of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] has changed his motion so as to escape the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. How does he escape it? He moved to strike out words which the House has just voted in, and that cannot be done.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that, and says that if the motion to strike out is voted down, then a motion to amend or to strike out and insert is in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not after the House has voted to insert. The gentleman has not moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, but only the vote by which the section as amended was adopted.

The SPEAKER. That leaves the section open to amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House voted on and adopted the amendment offered by my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] It is now proposed to strike out some of the words of that amendment. I say that it is not in order to move to strike out words that the House has inserted.

Mr. REAGAN. The proposition is in order to move to strike out, if it does not strike out the entire amendment alone. It is in order to move to strike out a portion of the words inserted in the previous amendments, but this proposition is to strike out only a portion of the words inserted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read from the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

Although it is not in order to strike out by itself what has been inserted, it may be moved to strike out a portion of the original paragraph comprehending what has been inserted, provided the coherence to be struck out be so substantial as to make this effectively a different proposition.

If it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can, by amendments, before the question is put for striking it out. But (contrary to the parliamentary practice) if on the question it be retained, neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert shall be precluded thereby, and a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.—Rule 46.

Mr. STEPHENS. The point of order the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] raises is applicable only to proceedings in the same stage of the bill. After these words now moved to be stricken out had been inserted yesterday, and in that stage of the bill, it would not have been in order to move to strike them out, according to the authority cited by the gentleman from Ohio, but now it is different; the motion has been made and carried to reconsider the eighth section as amended, that section therefore is now as original text and open to amendment; the whole section comes up again de novo. The amendment, therefore, is perfectly in order.

The SPEAKER. This amendment is not to strike out all the words, but only a portion of the words at a different stage, and the House having divested itself of the operation of the previous question, the Chair thinks it is competent to amend the section, under the statement of the Manual which has been read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Speaker allow me a word? There is nothing in this rule or in the Manual which speaks of the different stages of a measure. The only limitation of the power to strike out, or rather the only permission, is, that if an amendment has been adopted in the House a member may move to strike out all the amendment, if he includes some words belonging to the original text of the bill, but if he confines his motion to striking out the whole of the words just voted in, that motion is out of order at any stage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the House having ordered the previous question on the section as amended and adopted the same subsequently agreeing to a reconsideration thereon, then the bill is at a different stage of the proceedings, and it throws the section open to amendment.

Mr. REED. But when a motion is made to reconsider and is carried does it not throw the measure back under the operation of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. No; it is divested of the previous question the moment the reconsideration is carried.

Mr. REED. It leaves it stand then without the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It leaves it stand (as a section in this instance) in a different stage. Upon that point the Chair will cause to be read a passage from the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

Where a vote taken under the operation of the previous question is reconsidered, the question is then divested of the previous question, and is open to debate and amendment. [These decisions apply only to cases where the previous question was fully exhausted, by votes taken on all the questions covered by it, before the motion to reconsider was made. In any other case the pendency of the previous question would preclude debate.]

The SPEAKER. To hold the gentleman's point to be correct would be to say that the House having committed an error, as the House appears now to believe, in adopting the amendment yesterday, the phraseology of which was not clearly comprehended, there is no power in the House to correct that error. That could not possibly be a legitimate parliamentary decision.

Mr. REED. Had not the House the power to reconsider the amendment of the gentlemen from Ohio, [Mr. EWING?] Can words be stricken out which the House has put in?

The SPEAKER. The House can choose to take the longer way around, but the shortest way is proper.

Mr. REED. Can they take any other than the parliamentary way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that this section having been put back to the status held by it before the previous question was ordered upon it, it is now divested of the operation of the previous question and again opened to debate and amendment, as provided for by the rules.

Mr. WHITE. If the Chair will allow me a moment.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I think it is perfectly competent for the House to strike out a portion of this paragraph. What is the situation of this proposition? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] offered a modification of this section practically as an original proposition. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] suggested a modification, which was accepted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.] That proposition offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] modified in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] is an original proposition. It is therefore perfectly competent for the House to correct this section by striking out a portion of it. I apprehend it is entirely in order at this time to move to strike out the feature put into the section at the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] as much so as it would have been for any gentleman to have proposed an amendment to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. That would be in order if the rules permitted it. There is but one way under the rules to get at a case of this sort; that is to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. Has not the question been decided?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to listen to suggestions.

Mr. EWING. When will the debate close, then?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear suggestions. The House having got into this trouble, it is well to try to get out of it intelligently.

Mr. EWING. If the Chair had not decided the question I would have no objection to the debate running on indefinitely.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand that this section was adopted. Then the vote adopting it was reconsidered, which opens the section to amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] simply proposes to amend the section, not to amend some other amendments offered by somebody else.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of this section offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] was accepted as an original proposition. The Chair rules that it is now competent to amend it.

Mr. CONGER. There has been no vote on adopting the section; the only vote has been on the motion to strike out the section. The previous question was ordered on the section and amendments, and cannot be exhausted until the vote is taken on adopting the section.

Mr. STEPHENS. There was a vote on it.

Mr. CONGER. The RECORD does not show any such vote.

Mr. STEPHENS. And it was reconsidered.

Mr. CONGER. The RECORD does not show that.

The SPEAKER. By consent of the House this morning the vote was allowed to be considered as reconsidered by which the section as amended was agreed to. That put the section open to allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] to offer his amendment.

Mr. EWING. If I may be allowed to answer the question of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] as to the necessity for this amendment, I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to speak upon it.

Mr. EWING. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] as modified by the amendment which he accepted fixed the price of the gold and silver bullion for which the certificates were to issue at the average market value in New York and San Francisco of such bullion "in standard silver dollars" for the week preceding any purchase.

The object of my amendment now is to fix the price of such bullion in standard dollars "of like metal;" so that where gold is brought to the mints and certificates issued therefor, the price which is to govern the amount of the certificates shall be determined by the bullion value in gold dollars; and where silver is brought to the mints and certificates asked for, the price of that silver bullion is to be determined by the market value of silver bullion in silver dollars.

Mr. BELFORD. That is what I apprehended the effect of the amendment would be.

Mr. EWING. That is a proper amendment, and I think there should be no objection to it.

The amendment of Mr. EWING was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter the section as amended will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, or to receive bullion with the superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations, at the discretion of the depositor, not less than $5 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand, and certificates representing coin in the Treasury, together with those issued for bullion deposited, shall be received at par in payment of all dues to the United States, including duties on imports: Provided, That all certificates for gold or silver bullion shall be issued at the average market value of such bullion in standard coin of the same metal at the city of New York and San Francisco for the week preceding such deposit: Provided further, That gold or silver bullion which shall become the property of the Government by the return of certificates to the Treasury in payment of dues thereto shall be coined and paid out the same as other money.

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question on the section and pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. DAGGETT] has indicated to the Chair his desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. DAGGETT. I wish to offer an amendment (to which I presume there will be no objection) to insert after the words "Denver, Colorado," the words "or with the superintendent of the branch mint in Carson City."

Mr. REED. I would like to put a single question to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.] This section provides that silver coin or bullion may be deposited, among other places, at Denver, or, according to the amendment just indicated by the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. DAGGETT,] at Carson City, and certificates may be issued which shall be payable upon demand. These certificates, as I understand, are payable, for instance, at the sub-treasury in New York. Now, I wish to know who pays for the transportation.

Mr. WARNER. They are not made payable in New York. But they are receivable everywhere for dues to the Government.

Mr. REED. But who pays for the transportation of the metal from Denver; for instance, when the certificates are not presented at Denver?

Mr. WARNER. There is no transportation by the Government, except for the purpose of coinage.

Mr. REED. Will there not be transportation for the purpose of paying the certificates when demand for their payment is made?

Mr. WARNER. The demand can only be made at the place where the deposit is made, but the certificates are receivable by the Government for dues everywhere.

Mr. REED. Where is that provision in the section?

Mr. WARNER. There is nothing to the contrary in the section. That is the law now. The certificates are merely titles to the bullion deposited, and they must be returned to the place of deposit when their redemption is demanded; but when the Government receives those certificates for dues at custom-houses or internal-revenue offices, then the bullion which these certificates represent belongs to the Government, and if transported the Government merely transports its own property.

Mr. GARFIELD. What price is to be paid at Denver?

Mr. WARNER. The average price in coin of the same metal at San Francisco and New York during the week previous.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is, the Government is to pay for bullion delivered at the United States mint in Denver the New York price of bullion for the week previous, without regard to transportation.

Mr. WARNER. The average price for the week previous at New York and San Francisco.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word or two on this subject?

Mr. WARNER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to occupy the floor for a minute or two,

not to ask a question but to call the attention of the House to the fact that at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress there was enacted as a "rider" to an appropriation bill a provision that any owner of bullion might deposit it at the branch mint at Denver, and that certificates might issue representing the bullion so deposited. That is the law on the statute-book to-day. The object of the amendment which I offered yesterday was that certificates issued under the law as it stands, and representing bullion on deposit at the branch mint at Denver, might have the same advantages as certificates representing bullion deposited with the assistant treasurers of the United States.

Mr. WARNER. And they will have.

Mr. BELFORD. The Government of the United States has an assistant treasurer at New York, at Philadelphia, at Baltimore, at Cincinnati, at Saint Louis, at San Francisco, at New Orleans. Now I propose that a State which produces $50,000,000 of silver annually shall have the same advantages and rights under this law that Philadelphia or New Orleans or any other eastern city enjoys.

Mr. WARNER. That is right.

Mr. BELFORD. And I hope that the friends of this bill will stand by me, as I propose to stand by them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would like to offer an amendment which I think will be accepted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WARNER. I will admit the amendment of the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to put a question to my colleague. The bullion deposited under this bill at Denver or Carson City may, as I understand, find its way to the Treasury of the United States and become there a part of the property of the Government; and as the Government pays for it at Denver or Carson City the market price at New York, then it must at its own cost transport that bullion to the Treasury at Washington or the sub-treasury at New York, although it pays the parties when it buys it the same price that it would pay if they had transported it. Is that so?

Mr. WARNER. That is exactly what the Government does now. When the bullion becomes the property of the Government it will take it to its mints for coinage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has agreed to admit to be voted on an amendment of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. DAGGETT] and an amendment of the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.] Both amendments will be read.

The amendment of Mr. DAGGETT was read, as follows:

After the words "Denver, Colorado," insert "or with the superintendent of the branch mint in Carson City."

The amendment of Mr. MAGINNIS was read, as follows:

After the words "Carson City," insert "and of the Government assay offices."

Mr. WARNER. I now demand the previous question on the section and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. In order to end this matter I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered and move to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DAGGETT, it was adopted.

Mr. DAGGETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MAGINNIS, it was adopted.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the eighth section as amended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 72.

So the section, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the section, as amended, was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HASKELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. If it be a parliamentary inquiry, I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether he proposes to introduce an amendment so that the superintendents of these assay offices may give bond for the security of this bullion?

Mr. WARNER. We will attend to that in due time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That from and after the passage of this act only coins of smaller denominations than $1 shall be fabricated on Government account; and in converting bullion into bars or coin for depositors, precedence shall be given in the order in which deposits are made; but this provision shall not prohibit the delivery of coin or stamped bars in exchange for bullion as soon as its value is ascertained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] gave notice to the Chair that he proposed to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to offer an amendment to this section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama stated to the Chair that he desired when this section came up to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. SAMFORD. At the request of the friends of the bill I have decided not to offer that amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I offer the following amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 9 by adding after the word "act," in line 1, the words "except as provided in section 8;" and after the word "account," in line 3, insert the words "but the Secretary shall cause to be coined, to the full capacity of the mints, in connection with other coinage, the gold and silver bullion deposited for coinage under this act;" and by adding at the end of the section the following:

Provided, That in determining the market value of bullion for the purpose of ascertaining the charge for converting the same into coin, as provided by section 3524 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the fourth section of this act, said market value shall be the value of the bullion rated in coin of the same metal at its legal-tender value.

So the section will read as follows:

SEC. 9. That from and after the passage of this act, except as provided in section 8, only coins of smaller denominations than $1 shall be fabricated on Government account; but the Secretary shall cause to be coined, to the full capacity of the mints, in connection with other coinage, the gold and silver bullion deposited for coinage under this act; and in converting bullion into bars or coin for depositors, precedence shall be given in the order in which deposits are made; but this provision shall not prohibit the delivery of coin or stamped bars in exchange for bullion as soon as its value is ascertained: Provided, That in determining the market value of bullion for the purpose of ascertaining the charge for converting the same into coin, as provided by section 3524 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the fourth section of this act, said market rate shall be the value of the bullion rated in coin of the same metal at its legal-tender value.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question on the section and pending amendments.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether there is any provision in this bill for the coinage of standard silver dollars?

Mr. WARNER. It does make such provision for the bullion the Government becomes the owner of.

Mr. MILLS. I understand the section to read that only coins of smaller denominations than one dollar shall be fabricated on Government account.

Mr. WARNER. Except as provided in section 8.

Mr. MILLS. But section 8 does not provide for the coinage of silver dollars.

Mr. WARNER. It does by an amendment adopted yesterday, providing that the bullion the Government shall become the owner of shall be coined into standard dollars and paid out as other money.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. If this section is adopted what will become of the bullion now owned by the Government? His amendment only provides that as much as shall be received on deposit shall be coined on Government account.

Mr. WARNER. There are two ways in which the Government can dispose of it, put it in subsidiary coin or coin it into standard dollars.

Mr. CONGER. No; this section provides that the Government shall not coin any silver on its account.

Mr. WARNER. It does not provide that.

Mr. CLAFLIN. It gives back, as I understand, to the bullionist the 16 per cent. taken out by the fourth section.

Mr. WARNER. No, sir; it gives to the bullionist nothing. If there is any profit whatever it goes to the Government under the claim of the gentleman on that side.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WARNER. I will yield for a moment to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. I have examined with a great deal of care the closing part of this amendment which gentlemen suppose affects the amendment offered by me to the fourth section and which was adopted.

From that careful examination that I have made myself, and after consultation with some of the ablest minds upon this floor I am satisfied that this amendment does not change a particle the effect of my amendment to the fourth section. It has simply this merit that it does not cloud that which is already clear, and I hope it will be adopted to satisfy the gentleman on this side of the House.

Mr. CLAFLIN. If it does not change your amendment, why put it in?

Mr. MARSH. I do not put it in. I would rather have it out. But to satisfy gentlemen on this side of the House I am willing it should go in, because it is nothing more than a reiteration of that which is contained in my amendment to the fourth section; and it never can be construed by any court or by any judicial tribunal differently from the construction put upon the amendment to the fourth section.

Mr. CONGER. Would not this amendment, coming in in a later section of the bill, contrary as I believe it is to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSH,] be construed as repealing that?

Mr. MARSH. I will answer the gentleman. He assumes that it is contrary to my amendment to the fourth section. It is not. I will read it, and I ask the gentleman's attention:

Provided, That in determining the market value of bullion for the purpose of ascertaining the charge for converting the same into coin as provided by section 3524 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the fourth section of this act, said market value shall be the value of the bullion rated in coin of the same metal at its legal-tender value.

Now I say to gentlemen here that if the silver dollar is worth only ten cents in the dollar, its legal-tender value is one hundred cents. My amendment is not changed one particle. I hope the gentlemen on this side will stand by this amendment that I have just read for fear that if they vote it down gentlemen on the other side will get in an amendment that will carry out their idea and which will nullify my amendment to the fourth section, which this does not. I hope a vote upon it will now be taken.

Mr. WARNER. I call the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. EWING. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] I offer this amendment:

Before the word "value" insert the word "average," and add at the end the words "in the cities of New York and San Francisco for the week preceding such deposit."

Mr. WARNER. I accept that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire at the proper time, and I wish to see if this is the proper time, to submit a motion to strike out this section, for this reason: it repeals the so-called Bland bill. Under the law as it now is there must be at least two millions of silver dollars coined each month. If you repeal the Bland bill, then if any silver is coined it must be because it is deposited under the provisions of this bill. I think that I have the right to entertain a very grave doubt whether there ever will be any considerable amount of bullion deposited under the provisions of this bill; and if you repeal the Bland bill, I apprehend you will wake up some morning and find out that for the sake of obtaining some additional silver coinage you have lost that which we already have.

Now, sir, I do not believe it is wise to repeal the Bland bill. There should be either a striking out of this section 9 or an amendment providing that if silver bullion shall not be deposited to the extent of at least two millions a month the Secretary of the Treasury should enforce the Bland bill and buy the bullion and coin it.

Mr. WARNER. Under this bill, which provides for the unlimited coinage of silver with a seigniorage of the difference between bullion and coin, it is impossible that there should not at least the amount named go to the mints, if the people want that amount of money. It transfers the control from the Secretary of the Treasury to the people.

Mr. CONGER. Ah, we have seen the bullionists in the lobbies here yesterday and to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. It transfers to the people who own the silver the control of their money.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] allow me to answer his last remark?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the people deposit the bullion at the market price through all this machinery, well and good; but who will deposit it when with half the trouble he can get the same pay for it by a direct sale.

Mr. WARNER. He cannot do it under this bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Allow me a moment further. The gentleman from Ohio, I fear, either through design or through mistake or through ignorance, comes in with words of sweetness in his mouth in favor of the silver dollar to stab it and stop the mints. And to test that I ask him to admit the amendment I have indicated and let the House vote upon it at least.

Mr. WARNER. I am willing to admit the amendment that if two millions are not deposited under this bill the Government shall continue to coin to that extent. I have no objection whatever to that.

Mr. EWING. I hope the gentleman will make it four millions.

Mr. WHITE. To test the sense of the House, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. WARNER. I will hear it.

Mr. ROBESON. The language of this amendment, as I understand it, is that the market value shall be the value of the bullion rated in coin of the same metal at its legal-tender value. What does the word "rated" mean?

Mr. WARNER. "Reckoned" is perhaps a synonymous word.

Mr. ROBESON. Why, then, do you not say it shall be its market value in coin of the same metal, without using the word "rated."

Mr. WARNER. I will strike out the word "rated."

Mr. ROBESON. If that word is retained it would not accomplish the object. "Rated in coin of the same metal." The market value of coin of the same metal depends on the amount of bullion in the coin, does it not? And if there be some eighty-five cents' worth of bullion in the coin the difference is nothing.

Mr. WARNER. But if there is profit, the Government gets it. The other side of the House have insisted that under free coinage there would be a profit. Now, I have framed this amendment so that if there be a profit, as they claim, the Government would get it.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no, the bullionists.

Mr. WARNER. No, the Government gets it.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: If you rate bullion at its market value in money worth eighty-five cents, at legal-tender value, then do you not pay one hundred cents in legal-tender money for bullion which is worth only eighty-five cents? Does not the Government pay to the bullionist fifteen cents on the dollar?

Mr. WARNER. It does not.

Mr. ROBESON. I put it to the reason of every reasoning man.

Mr. WARNER. I will modify my amendment by striking out the word "rated."

Mr. CONGER. I would like to know why we have to cut out all the words in favor of the bullionist one by one.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the previous question.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman wants to satisfy everybody let him strike out the word "rated," and also the words "legal-tender value."

Mr. WARNER. Oh, that is another thing. I will strike out the word "rated," and now I call for the previous question.

Mr. FORT. Do I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. He has.

Mr. FORT. I wish to know before he demands the previous question whether the motion I made to strike out this section is now pending?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The demand for the previous question if sustained cuts off further amendments.

Mr. FORT. Then I hope the motion for the previous question will not be sustained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can attain his object if the previous question is voted down on the section.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] proposes to accept my amendment.

Mr. CONGER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] was offered before these amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not any certain knowledge on the subject.

Mr. FORT. I desire to say a few words upon this question.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be voted down the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. I made a motion to strike out the section before the previous question was called, and I insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. The friends of the section had the right to perfect its text before a motion to strike out would be in order.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that, but when will my motion be in order?

The SPEAKER. The same result will be attained if the section when amended is voted down as the motion to strike out would reach.

Mr. WHITE. But I have a right to test the sense of the House on a preliminary motion to strike it out.

The SPEAKER. Not until the friends of the section have had a right to perfect the text. The previous question, if sustained, would temporarily cut off such motion.

Mr. WHITE. But my motion is pending.

The SPEAKER. It can go in afterward, but the same object will be reached when the House votes on the section as amended, and if the House votes it down of course it goes out of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. That is another way of doing the same thing.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not the text absolutely perfect now?

Mr. WARNER. It is about as correct as the act of 1873 which my colleague voted for and says that he did not know what was in it.

Mr. REED. We are paying the bullionist 17 per cent. now and pay it to him where he lives.

Mr. FORT. I think we ought to debate this question.

The SPEAKER. If the House thinks so the House will vote down the previous question. That is the remedy.

Mr. FORT. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] understands what he is about I hope he will lead off and let us have a vote.

Mr. WARNER. I am satisfied with the section as it is, but other gentlemen are not, and I am willing to admit the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

The Clerk read Mr. CANNON'S amendment, as follows:

Provided, That in the event that silver bullion is not deposited under the provisions of this act available for coinage to the amount of $2,000,000 per month then the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue to purchase under the provisions of the law of February 28, 1878, sufficient silver bullion to coin $2,000,000 per month.

Mr. WARNER. I accept that amendment; and now I call for the previous question on the section and the amendments thereto.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman to accept this amendment:

Provided, That nothing in this section contained chall prevent the coining of the bullion already belonging to the Government in the Treasury.

Mr. WARNER. There is nothing to prevent that now.

Mr. CONGER. Well, let that be put in.

Mr. WARNER. I insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, upon a division—ayes 108, noes 82; and the main question was then ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote ordering the main question; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The amendment as modified will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act, except as provided in section 8, only coins of less denominations than $1 shall be fabricated on Government account, but the Secretary shall cause to be coined, up to the full capacity of the mints, in connection with other coinage, the gold and silver bullion deposited for coinage under this act; and in converting bullion into bars or coins for depositors precedence shall be given in the order in which deposits are made; but this provision shall not prevent the delivery of coin or stamped bars in exchange for bullion as soon as its value is ascertained: Provided, That in determining the average market value of bullion, for the purpose of ascertaining the charge for converting the same into coin as provided by section 3524 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the fourth section of this act, said market rate shall be the value of the bullion in coin of the same metal at its legal-tender value in the cities of New York and San Francisco for the week preceding such deposit: Provided further, That in the event silver bullion is not deposited under the provisions of this act available for coinage to the amount of $2,000,000 per month, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue to purchase, under the provisions of the law of February 28, 1878, sufficient silver bullion to coin $2,000,000 per month.

Mr. WARNER. I think there is a verbal error in the amendment as read.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is too late to change anything now; the text of the amendment is the property of the House now.

Mr. WARNER. I am not going to change it; I think it was not correctly read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ordinarily we do not read with a pencil. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The amendment was read correctly.

The amendment, as modified, was then agreed to.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was upon agreeing to the section as amended.

Mr. STEPHENS. Is not now the time for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to make his motion to strike out this section, if he is going to do it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the vote on agreeing to the section will accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS. So do I; but the gentleman seemed to be desirous to make the motion to strike out.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the section as amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 97, noes 68.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. WHITE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being upon a division—ayes 13, noes 103; not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

So the section, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the section as amended was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is it in order now to move a substitute for the remaining sections of this bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The House has determined to consider this bill by sections, and there are two sections yet undisposed of. The Clerk will now read the section recommended by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The Clerk read as follows:

That after the passage of this act the President shall signify to such foreign governments as he may deem advisable that the United States is ready to co-operate with other nations in the establishment of a common ratio between gold and silver.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out that section.

Mr. WARNER. I am willing to have it voted down.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to strike out the words "after the passage of this act." We want the President to do this some time, and those words should be stricken out. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection to striking out those words.

The amendment of Mr. CONGER was not agreed to; there being upon a division—ayes 47, noes 89.

The section recommended by the committee was not adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The last section of the bill was read, as follows:

All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that section if adopted would repeal all the statutes of the United States, every one of them, for they are certainly inconsistent with this bill.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House and not for the Chair.

Mr. WARNER. It will repeal the fraudulent statutes which my colleague helped to pass, and that is the main object of it.

Mr. GILLETTE. I wish to offer an additional section, to come in before the one just read, which I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will accept.

Mr. WARNER. I am willing that it shall be voted upon.

The additional section moved by Mr. GILLETTE was as follows:

All gold and silver certificates provided for by this act shall be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, unless otherwise provided by contract.

Mr. WARNER. That is inconsistent with this bill.

Mr. WEAVER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 135, not voting 77; as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD. I move by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Objection was made.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. GILLETTE. I wished to occupy a moment in support of my amendment, but as I was denied that opportunity I now ask leave to print some remarks in explanation of that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that the friends of the bill have forbidden debate. They have prohibited to me the opportunity to speak on it, [laughter,] yet the greenbackers now ask for leave to print their remarks. Let them withdraw the demand for the previous question and give us all a chance to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The previous question did not prevail on that amendment. The House wanted to vote without debate. Does the gentleman object to granting leave to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CONGER. I do object, as the greenbackers will not allow us an opportunity to speak on this bill.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I now present the following to come in as a separate section.

The Clerk reads as follows:

SEC. 10. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the coinage of silver except into the standard dollar.

Mr. WARNER. I accept that. It is right, and I demand the previous question on that section.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let it be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FARR. I desire to offer an amendment to come in as a new section.

Mr. WARNER. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow the amendment to be read for information?

Mr. WARNER. I object. I demand the previous question on the section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question. The remedy is with the House.

Mr. CONGER. On what does the gentleman from Ohio demand the previous question?

The SPEAKER. On the eleventh section.

Mr. CONGER. We have not reached that yet. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. FARR] offers a new section as section 10.

The SPEAKER. There is a section 10 in the bill now.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that section 10 was stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] submitted an amendment which was adopted and is now in the bill as section 10.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has frequently stated that when a new section is proposed it should come in before the last section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio had demanded the previous question on the last section, but withdrew it for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to offer his amendment. He now renews the demand for the previous question; and the gentleman in charge of the bill must have charge.

Mr. WARNER. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman decline to have the amendment read?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I submit that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. FARR] was on the floor and could not be taken from it by the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not on the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. He was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had stated that the gentleman from Ohio demanded the previous question on the last section of the bill. The remedy is in the House to vote down the previous question.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. The gentleman had offered his amendment before that.

The SPEAKER. The amendment has not been offered. It has never been even read yet. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question on the last section of the bill.

The previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the main question.

Mr. CONGER. I call for a division on seconding the demand for the previous question. I rose in my place to do so before the Chair declared that the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. WARNER. I make the point that the question has been taken and decided.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Michigan states that he rose in his place and demanded a division. The Chair will again submit the question on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will wait——

Mr. CONGER. I wish to be in time. I narrowly escaped before from the rapidity with which the Chair put the question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 103, no 1.

Mr. CONGER. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow the gentleman from New Hampshire to offer his amendment. That is all we want.

Mr. WARNER. Very well. Let it be read. [Laughter.] I do not agree to its being offered.

The Clerk read Mr. FARR's amendment, as follows:

That after the passage of this act members of Congress shall be paid only in standard silver dollars.

Many MEMBERS. "Ay!" "Ay!"

Mr. STEVENSON. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. WARNER. I now demand the previous question on the last section of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the previous question on the amendment which has just been read.

The SPEAKER. It was only read for information.

Mr. WARNER. I only yielded to have it read for information.

Mr. HOUK. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire to pay members of Congress in the legal-tender silver dollar that he so ardently desires for the people. Why force the people other than Congressmen to take the silver and refuse to take it ourselves?

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman from Ohio not accept silver dollars for his pay?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly I will. I am always happy to get them, or certificates either.

The SPEAKER. A quorum did not vote, and the Chair will appoint tellers. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WARNER, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would like to hear the amendment read again.

The SPEAKER. It was only read for information.

Mr. COX. We cannot vote on it, as we are all interested in it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I rise to a question of order. If that amendment is adopted, will it not override the Appropriations Committee, as we have not made any appropriations yet?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Let it apply to the President and everybody else.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 110, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to let the bill be printed that we may see what it is now, and act upon it at our next meeting. There have been a large number of amendments made and nobody can tell with any coherency what the bill now is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] can demand the previous question on the final passage of the bill. The House can then adjourn and the bill can then be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. What became of the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. FARR?] I want a chance to vote upon that, and I want gentlemen on the other side who are advocates of the silver bill to have a chance to vote upon it.

Mr. FORT. I desire to vote for it in good faith.

The SPEAKER. That amendment was not pending; it was only read for information.

Mr. HOUK. I desire to make an inquiry.

Mr. WARNER. I object to inquiries. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question on seconding the demand for the previous question. The count of the tellers is—ayes 110, noes 32; lacking two of a quorum. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. HOUK. I want to make an appeal to the gentleman from Ohio. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Owing to the disorder that has prevailed there are many of us who do not know what is in the bill. Before finally acting upon it, I think we should at least have the opportunity of reading it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is not now in order.

Mr. HOUK. I only want to ask that the bill be printed, so that we may read it; and if possible gather up its fragments and try to understand them, so as to vote intelligently.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

The tellers continued the count, and reported—ayes 110, noes 34.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was taken upon ordering the main question; and on a division there were—ayes 100, noes 8.

Mr. WHITE. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that pending that, the bill, as amended, will be ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that some substitutes for the bill are to be offered, and I hope that they will be ordered to be printed as well as the bill itself, so that we may have the benefit of seeing them together in the morning.

Mr. WARNER. If we can have the previous question——

Mr. WHITE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is making a proposition to try and meet the wishes of the House, and the Chair is disposed to hear it.

Mr. WARNER. If we can have the previous question ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and the House then insists on an adjournment, I will not object, but I want to reach that point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio states that if the main question is ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, he will acquiesce in an adjournment, so that the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman asks too many conditions.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many do you want?

Mr. CONGER. Will he allow all the substitutes to be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that that is the proposition.

Mr. CONGER. Let him say so, then; let him include any substitute that may be offered.

The SPEAKER. Upon reflection, the Chair would suggest that the gentleman demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and then ask for the previous question on the final passage of the bill, that would put the bill in the RECORD in the morning, so that the House could see what they are voting on in the final passage.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. WARNER. I cannot yield for any other amendments.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. [Loud cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. KENNA. Before the motion is put I would like to make a statement. The legislative, &c., appropriation bill is now in the hands of the enrolling clerk, and it is important that the bill should be reported to the House to-morrow in order that it may get to the President.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] will withdraw his motion.

Mr. CLYMER. I withdraw it.

Mr. WHITE. I renew the motion.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 62, noes 122.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to withdraw the objection I made to allowing the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] to print some remarks upon his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I renew the objection.

The question was taken on Mr. CONGER'S motion; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 102.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 118, not voting 81; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. COVERT. I desire to state that Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi, is paired with Mr. STONE, of Michigan.

Mr. KIMMEL. My colleague, Mr. MCLANE, is paired with Mr. BLAND, of Missouri.

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN, of New York.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. COWGILL.

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. WASHBURN, of Minnesota. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. ARMFIELD. My colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with Mr. FISHER, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with Mr. MILES.

Mr. AIKEN. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, is paired with Mr. O'REILLY, of New York; and my colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, is paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York.

Mr. FISHER. I am paired with Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. My colleague, Mr. HARMER, is paired with Mr. ELLIS, of Louisiana; and my colleague, Mr. KILLINGER, is paired with Mr. WELLS, of Missouri.

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, is paired with Mr. CONVERSE, of Ohio.

Mr. SAMFORD. My colleague, Mr. SHELLEY, is paired with Mr. KETCHAM, of New York.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. WHITE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. The legislative appropriation bill must go over until Monday any way, the Senate having adjourned till Monday.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. WHITE; and upon a division there were—ayes 27, noes 95.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. STEPHENS. It does not require a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Less than a quorum cannot adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. BELFORD. One moment.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. WHITE. Regular order.

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, give a man a fair chance. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio to consent to the printing of this bill in the RECORD to-morrow morning, and then let the House now adjourn. I feel assured that if this bill is printed, and a number of gentlemen on this side of the House can have an opportunity to read it, the majority on its passage will be greater than if the gentleman demands a vote upon it to-night. I ask this as a friend of the measure.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] submitted a few minutes since, was that this bill should be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and then that the previous question should be ordered upon its passage; and in addition to that, that the bill, as it now stands, be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow, so that before the final vote is taken upon the passage of the bill every gentleman would have an opportunity to read it.

Mr. CONGER. But we do not want the previous question ordered. I state here that if it is I will demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. You may demand it, and we will have it read for you.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to submit for the consideration of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the House an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that it be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to its reading.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio who has charge of this bill——

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Pending general debate on this measure I offered an amendment, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio and of the House, and the Chair declared it was pending. That amendment is a substitute for the entire bill, and I think it should be voted upon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think so.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. You may not think so, but I do.

The SPEAKER. The House has the power to cut off the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas; the Chair does not do it.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. No, sir; but the demand for the previous question is designed to cut off my substitute and all amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what the design of it is, but that is the effect of it.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. The effect is to do that, and I presume that the design is to do it. It is immaterial what the design is if that is the effect of it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to submit this proposition: the majority of the House ought to act intelligently and know what they are voting on. It occurs to me that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] would save time if he would allow this bill to be printed in the RECORD, so that we can see what it now is. It may be that to-morrow we may want to substitute something else for it.

Mr. WARNER. It may be that some members will want to open the flood-gates for a thousand different things. If there is anything improper in the bill, the vote ordering the main question can be reconsidered to-morrow.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. No quorum voted on that proposition, and the Chair will therefore appoint Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 3, noes 75.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the regular order would be to have a quorum in the House.

Mr. COX. I move a call of the House.

Mr. WHITE. In the absence of a quorum I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman withdraws the point that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to withdraw the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; I do not. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, which I have just indicated, but I insist upon my motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on the point that no quorum voted upon the last vote?

Mr. WHITE. I do.

Mr. COX. Then I move a call of the House. That is all that can be done.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 79, noes 87.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WILBER. Was there not a quorum upon the last vote?

The SPEAKER. There was.

Mr. WILBER. Why, then, should we have a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] insists on his motion that when the House adjourns it be until Monday next, upon which no quorum had voted; therefore the House is brought back to that question.

Mr. WILBER. A quorum might have come in since.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question again. As the gentleman suggests, members may have come in since the last vote was taken.

The question being again taken on the motion of Mr. WHITE, that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, there were—ayes 19, noes 90.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum!

Mr. MILLS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 26, nays 117, not voting 142; as follows:

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. SHELLEY is paired with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. MONEY is paired with Mr. STONE. If present, Mr. MONEY would vote "no" and Mr. STONE would vote "ay."

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. TUCKER is paired with Mr. LAPHAM.

Mr. LE FEVRE. Mr. ATHERTON is paired with Mr. MORSE, and Mr. MYERS is paired with Mr. COWGILL.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. WASHBURN. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. FROST is paired with Mr. EINSTEIN.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. VOORHIS.

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. NEWBERRY. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, is paired with Mr. O'REILLY, and my other colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, with Mr. CAMP.

Mr. SIMONTON. Mr. CLYMER is paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. COBB. My colleague, Mr. COLERICK, is paired with Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am paired with Mr. BROWNE. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am paired with Mr. CLYMER.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. WASHBURN is paired with Mr. CONVERSE.

Mr. URNER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MCLANE.

Mr. WAIT. I move by unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. WHITE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The yeas are 26 and the nays 117.

Mr. WHITE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative and makes a quorum. So the House refuses to adjourn over until Monday next.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the regular order, which is on the previous question.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move the House adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on ordering the main question on the last section of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. No; on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the record.

Mr. CONGER. The House was dividing by tellers, and the Chair announced there was no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is never positive, and will consult the record of the reporters.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The record will show that the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for the record, and there is no occasion to have any feeling on the subject. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.
The tellers continued to count, and reported—ayes 110, noes 34.
So the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The record shows the pending question is on ordering the main question to be put. The record of the reporters is corroborated by the Journal.

Mr. CONGER. I was one of the tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will remember that the tellers were asked to resume their places, and that afterward several gentlemen came forward and voted.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know what was reported. I only speak for myself.

Mr. KENNA. If we follow the record on it will be found that other gentlemen voted, sufficient in number at least to make a quorum.

Mr. WARNER. As the Chair has suggested the tellers were requested to resume their places, and they did resume their places and reported the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman counted them while I was not there as one of the tellers.

The SPEAKER. The count was reported to the House and it was not disputed at the time.

Mr. BELFORD. Is it right to dispute the record at this time?

Mr. WARNER. It is entirely too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the count of the tellers to have been disputed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The Chair announced the previous question was seconded. I remember it well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated there were some votes lacking to make up a quorum, and asked the tellers to resume their places; and the tellers having resumed their places the count was reported to the House, members having subsequently voted more than sufficient to make a quorum.

Mr. CONGER. My understanding is that the tellers simply separated before a quorum was reached.

Mr. WARNER. That is true, but when the tellers resumed their places members came forward and voted making more than a quorum.

Mr. CONGER. I only have my own recollection of it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. We have not got that far. The House is now on the last section.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed we had passed that.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, no, you have been filibustering on that all this time.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The eleventh and last section was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the last section of the bill was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I now demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. BELFORD. I move that the House do now adjourn. I desire to have the bill as amended printed before we finally act on it.

Mr. WARNER. I want the previous question ordered, and then the bill can be ordered to be printed in the RECORD and we will adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. That is what we object to. Let the bill be printed without ordering the previous question on the engrossment. We want to amend the bill.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question if sustained would cut off any amendment.

Mr. WILBER. That is what we do not want. We want to have the opportunity of looking at the bill and offering amendments if we desire to do so.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question is sustained that cuts off all opportunity of amending the bill, does it not?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered on the engrossment and third reading of this bill that carries it to the final passage, and the Chair presumes the gentleman from Ohio would again demand the previous question on the passage of the bill. The effect of those motions, if sustained, would be to cut off any further amendment.

Mr. WHITE. And to cut off the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN?]

Mr. BELFORD. I understood that the demand for the printing of this bill in the RECORD made by some gentlemen on this side of the House arose from the desire to see the bill with its amendments in proper shape to-morrow morning. It seems to me that the friends of this measure will make just as much progress if they consent to have this bill and all the amendments published in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARNER. They will see it in the RECORD. It will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. We will see it when it is too late.

Mr. WARNER. There can be a reconsideration if anything is found to be wrong.

The SPEAKER. Even if the previous question is allowed to operate on the third reading, if the majority of the House desire, they can refuse to order the previous question on the final passage of the bill, and recommit it, and when again reported it would be open for amendment.

Mr. CONGER. But if the previous question is not ordered now that leaves it just as it would be in the case suggested by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered on the engrossment and third reading to-night and the House adjourns, it would be competent to-morrow, if the previous question is not sustained on the final passage of the bill, to entertain a motion to recommit.

Mr. WHITE. If on an examination of the bill when printed we find it to be defective in any particular, can we afterward offer any amendment whatever?

The SPEAKER. After the operation of the previous question is exhausted then a motion can be made to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HOUK. Before the vote is taken on seconding the demand for the previous question let the bill be read for information.

Mr. WARNER. I do not consent to that. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WILBER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] demands the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. Pending that, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILBER] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SIMONTON. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 95, not voting 114; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. COVERT. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY, is paired with Mr. STONE, of Michigan.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 86, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Acklen,	Einstein,	Knott,	Reed,

Davis, Joseph J.	Kimmel,	Prescott,
Dick,	Kitchin,	Price,

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) On the call of the roll one hundred and fifty-five members have answered to their names.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move that the doors now be closed and the absentees sent for.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule requires that to be done.

Mr. CONGER. There is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is.

Mr. KENNA. I submit that this House has a right to enforce its rules, which require members to be present during its sessions unless excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read Rule 36.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon the call of the House the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk and the absentees noted, after which the names of the absentees shall again be called over; the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Now, let us send for them.

Mr. CONGER. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, a quorum being present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order.

The motion of Mr. CONGER was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is now in order for excuses to be offered for absentees.

Mr. STEVENSON. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those who are absent on leave are excused.

Mr. SPARKS. Has the order been executed for closing the doors?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ordered that to be done.

Mr. SAPP. Is not my colleague, Mr. PRICE, absent by leave of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Journal will show that.

Mr. STEPHENS. The names of the absentees should be called in alphabetical order, at which time excuses can be received for them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule provides that the roll shall be called, after which the list of absentees shall be called over; that has been done. The rule then provides that those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuse is made may be ordered by those present, if fifteen in number, to be taken into custody.

Mr. STEPHENS. But the usual practice is to have the list of absentees called over in alphabetical order for excuses.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and fifty-five members answered to their names.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Then by what rule have the doors been closed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The members present have the right under the rules of the House to require all other members to be present, except such as have been previously excused by order of the House. Therefore every member who is now absent without previous leave is in contempt of the rules of the House, and they will now be sent for and brought before the bar of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is not in order until proceedings under the call have been dispensed with.

Mr. CONGER. Is that so? I would like to know what that rule is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated the rule. Does the gentleman appeal from the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. CONGER. It would gratify us all to hear that rule read.

Mr. McKENZIE. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be sent for the absentees.

Mr. MARSH. I ask permission to be absent for one half hour.

Mr. McMAHON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. No motion of the House is necessary to have the order of the House executed.

Mr. SPARKS. It is in order now, I suppose, to offer excuses for absent members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is, for those absent without leave.

Mr. SPARKS. I wanted to state that more than a week ago——

Mr. CLAFLIN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SPARKS. I am making an excuse for an absent member.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. My point of order is that the list of absentees should now be called for excuses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not entertain any motion until order is restored.

Mr. COX. My point is that the list of absentees should be called by the Clerk and excuses given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no rule upon the subject, but if there is no objection the list of absentees will be called, and such as are not already excused may have excuses presented for them.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is the usual practice; and when the roll has been gone through with in that way the Sergeant-at-Arms is ordered to arrest all for whom no sufficient excuses have been given. The list of absentees should be called in alphabetical order, and as each name is called excuses, if any, can be given; and when excused the names will be crossed off the list. The Sergeant-at-Arms will then be ordered to arrest and bring to the bar of the House all those not excused.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House now adjourn. I insist that a motion to adjourn is always in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain no proposition until gentlemen resume their seats and order is restored. [After a pause.] The Chair having examined the rule as to adjournment pending a call of the House, reverses his decision in regard to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and entertains his motion that the House now adjourn.

Mr. MARSH. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. MARSH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know whether the doors are closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the motion to adjourn be adopted that will open the doors.

Mr. MARSH. I want to know whether the doors are closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They ought to be closed.

Mr. MARSH. By whose authority?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By the authority of the rules.

Mr. CONGER. Fifteen members have not demanded the closing of the doors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules of the House require that the doors be closed.

Mr. CONGER. But no fifteen members have demanded a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 86.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The determination of this motion does not require a quorum.

Mr. CONGER. Then I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty-four members (more than one-fifth of the last vote) voting in favor thereof.

Mr. MARSH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know whether the doors are closed yet?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's parliamentary inquiry has already been answered by the statement that the doors have been ordered by the Chair to be closed, under the rules of the House.

Mr. MARSH. I want to know whether members who are outside can get in to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HOUSE. Is the order that the absentees be sent for being executed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order has not yet been made by the House.

A MEMBER. Then let us make it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It cannot be made pending the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—yeas 51, nays 82, not voting 152; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. VANCE. My colleague, Mr. DAVIS, is paired with Mr. LINDSEY, of Maine.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi, is paired with Mr. STONE, of Michigan.

Mr. SAPP. My colleague, Mr. PRICE, is paired with Mr. BUCKNER. I think Mr. PRICE would vote "ay."

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island.

Mr. CLARDY. I am paired with Mr. MULLER. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. NORCROSS. My colleague, Mr. RICE, is paired with Mr. ELAM.

Mr. DIBRELL. My colleague, Mr. WHITTHORNE, is paired with Mr. BRIGGS, of New Hampshire.

Mr. SIMONTON. Mr. CLYMER is paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MCKENZIE,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are absent without leave of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion, I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No business has intervened.

Mr. CONGER. The resolution has been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not intervening business.

Mr. CONGER. Is not the presentation and reading of a resolution business?

Mr. REAGAN. The House is dividing.

The resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the order just made the Clerk will prepare the warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. State it.

Mr. CONGER. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 85.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the absentees to be sent for.

Mr. KENNA. I move to lay that on the table.

Mr. MCMILLIN. How did the gentleman from Michigan vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No record having been taken, the Chair presumes the gentleman from Michigan voted in the majority.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Unless the gentleman from Michigan states that he voted in the affirmative he has no right to make the motion.

Mr. CONGER. That has been decided so often I do not consider it even courteous to make a reply to it. [Laughter.] I suppose the gentleman from Illinois has intelligence enough to understand that decision.

Mr. CARLISLE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 49.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSE. Is the order of the House being executed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order of the House will be executed.

Mr. CONGER. While the motion to reconsider is pending I suppose the order of the House cannot be executed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There will be no absentees brought to the bar until this question has been determined, but the order having been issued the Chair does not know whether the officers are executing it or not.

Mr. CONGER. I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has voted on that.

Mr. CONGER. I have a rule to show the motion to adjourn is in order at any time:

The motion to adjourn may be repeated, though no question has been put or decided since the former motion.

Mr. COX. What rule is that?

Mr. CONGER. It is on page 153 of the Manual.

Mr. COX. I would like to see that rule.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair ruled that it required some business to intervene, such as a vote; but I have the authority here to show that no such business need intervene.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order that after the doors are closed no dilatory motions are in order. That has been the uniform usage.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. COX. I stated that it has been the usage of the House that no motion to adjourn can be entertained while we are proceeding under a call of the House as now.

Mr. CONGER. Where is the gentleman's authority for that?

Mr. WILBER. That is an assertion without proof.

Mr. DIBRELL. I insist on the execution of the order of the House that the absent members be sent for and brought to the bar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order of the House is being executed as fast as it can be. The Chair will submit the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 44.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 24, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 37, nays 69, not voting 179; as follows:

YEAS—37.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. WASHBURN, of Minnesota. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. ROBESON. I am paired upon the silver bill with Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. On this question I am not paired.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am paired with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. KELLEY is paired with Mr. MORSE.

Mr. HOSTETLER. My colleague, Mr. COBB, is paired with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion to lay the motion of the gentleman from Michigan on the table, and make the point of order that it is not competent to make a motion to reconsider the vote of the House directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in the absentees; that the only way in which the effect of that order can be obviated is to move to suspend further proceedings under the call, and I submit that question to the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman withdraws his motion I will withdraw mine, and I now move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 26, noes 60.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to inquire if the Doorkeeper is permitting any members to enter the Hall who were not here when the roll was called and the names of the absentees were called?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope the Chair will instruct the Doorkeeper to admit none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has instructed him to that effect.

Mr. COX. I made a point of order some little time ago which the Chair has not decided. I now wish to ask of the Chair whether or not the order of the House is being executed.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. I desire to inquire further whether or not after this vote is taken any more dilatory motions are in order?

The SPEAKER. The officers are now executing the orders of the House and this motion does not interfere with their doings.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 47, nays 80, not voting 158; as follows:

So the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am paired with the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. RYAN.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. WASHBURN. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. HURD. I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. LEWIS. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "ay."

Mr. LE FEVRE. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. MYERS, and Mr. COWGILL are paired.

Mr. COVERT. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY, is paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. STONE.

Mr. COBB. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HENDERSON. My colleague, Mr. COLERICK, is paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. NEWBERRY. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. O'REILLY; and my colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CAMP.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE. My colleague from Mississippi, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. WAIT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. STEELE. My colleague, Mr. LORING, is paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. HOOKER.

Mr. NORCROSS. My colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. RICE, is paired with the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ELAM.

Mr. ROBESON. I am paired on the silver bill with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. RUSSELL. As the pair does not apply to this question, I vote "ay."

Mr. BURROWS. My colleague, Mr. BREWER, is paired with the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. GUNTER.

Mr. BARBER. My colleague from Illinois, Mr. ALDRICH, is paired with the gentleman from Nevada, Mr. DAGGETT.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED, is paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. My colleague, Mr. LAPHAM, who is absent on account of sickness in his family, is paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. BINGHAM. My colleague, Mr. KELLEY, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MORSE.

Mr. DWIGHT. My colleague, Mr. MASON, is absent by leave of the House on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. SAPP. My colleague, Mr. PRICE, is absent by leave of the House. On this question he would vote "ay."

Mr. WHITE. My colleague, Mr. OVERTON, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. YOUNG.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand that the Sergeant-at-Arms is prepared to report with members in his custody. I ask that those members be brought in.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar, having in custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. SCALES, Mr. STEELE, Mr. FRYE, Mr. WARD, Mr. JONES, Mr. DAGGETT, Mr. O'NEILL, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. BROWNE, Mr. JOYCE, Mr. REED, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. WILLIAMS of Wisconsin, Mr. MILLS, Mr. RYAN of Kansas, Mr. DAVIS of North Carolina, Mr. ALDRICH of Illinois, Mr. LINDSEY, Mr. YOCUM, Mr. LADD, and Mr. OSMER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. SCALES, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SCALES. I have only this excuse, Mr. Speaker, I was hungry; I went to get my dinner, and did not expect to get caught. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the House in reference to the excuse submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MCMAHON. I move that he be discharged from further custody without payment of costs.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend so as to discharge all these gentlemen. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. WILSON. I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment is not in order. The rule requires that each excuse shall be given separately and the action of the House had thereon.

Mr. SPARKS. Ought not all members to be seated except the criminals?

Mr. REED. I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No member under arrest can address the Chair except to present his excuse when his name is called.

Mr. MILLS. When we are called "criminals" we have a right to insist that the words be taken down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore was proceeding to put the question on the motion of Mr. MCMAHON, when

Mr. MCMAHON said: I want to know whether these gentlemen who are arraigned are not voting on this proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are not permitted to vote until discharged from arrest.

The motion of Mr. MCMAHON was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. STEELE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STEELE. Well, sir, none upon the face of the earth except that I was hungry, and I found a gentleman from Cape Cod who was as hungry as I was; and we paired. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. I move that the gentleman from North Carolina be discharged without payment of costs.

Mr. WHITE. I move that these gentlemen now arraigned at the bar be seated pending these proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. These gentlemen who are in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms at the bar of the House have the right to have the question settled as to them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEELE] in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair assumes that he is.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 10.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. FRYE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Are these gentlemen allowed to vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are not while in custody.

Mr. WILSON. I insist that they have the constitutional right to vote, which right cannot be taken away from them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They have no right to vote until they are discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Mr. FRYE, what excuse have you to offer for your absence without leave of the House?

Mr. FRYE. I have no excuse.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the gentleman be discharged without the payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call. [Cries of "No!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. WARD, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave; what excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WARD. My excuse is this: having been in the House continuously and voting on every question until six o'clock, I went down stairs to get some needed refreshment and was gone about fifteen minutes.

Mr. WILBER. What was it?

Mr. WARD. Coffee. When I returned I found there had been a call of the House, and the doors were closed.

Mr. MCMAHON. Unless the gentleman will disclose what kind of refreshment it was I shall have to move that he be liable to the payment of costs.

Mr. WILBER. He said coffee.

Mr. WARD. It was coffee.

Mr. MCMAHON. Very well; I move the gentleman be excused without the payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, and I submit that the motion is in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ROBESON. Since the House has excused a gentleman who said he had no excuse I move that all the others be discharged without excuse.

Mr. O'NEILL. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has submitted a motion that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. As that would operate to discharge all gentlemen in custody it is in order, and it is the only motion in order besides the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 97.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I move the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. JONES, of Texas, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. JONES. I had been in the House continuously——[Cries of "Louder!"] I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I had been in the House continuously until after five o'clock, when the yeas and nays were being called; and having answered to my name, and taking it for granted the House would act sensibly and adjourn, as it was my usual hour I went to my dinner. In the belief that the House would adjourn I was, however, mistaken.

Mr. MILLS. You were the victim of misplaced confidence.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the gentleman be excused without the payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. O'NEILL. I left the House and supposed, of course, I should get back before a quorum was wanted. When I left I knew there were plenty of gentlemen in the Hall to do the business of the House well and vote yea or nay on all propositions. I staid, however, longer than I expected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That is not a good excuse.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to know what is the extent of the power of the House in punishing these gentlemen.

Mr. O'NEILL. If the gentleman from Georgia had stood up here as long as we have, he would have considered it a good deal of punishment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Georgia, the Chair directs Rule 37 to be read.

Mr. MILLS. And I hope the gentleman from Georgia will be required to stand and listen while it is being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

37. When a member shall be discharged from custody and admitted to his seat, the House shall determine whether such discharge shall be with or without paying fees; and in like manner whether a delinquent member, taken into custody by a special messenger, shall or shall not be liable to defray the expenses of such special messenger.

Mr. WILBER. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. DAGGETT, of Nevada, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DAGGETT. For the past three or four weeks I have had a very severe and dangerous malady of the throat. I had an engagement with my physician at six o'clock, and I left here at half past five to fulfill it.

Mr. FRYE. I wish that the same disease prevailed generally in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the gentleman be excused and discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am an old man; I am a very old man.

Several MEMBERS. How old? [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, in point of years I am the father of this House, and I do not think it would be a very gracious thing on the part of the House to impose a fine or any penalty on the father of the House. When Fagin was called into court and was asked if he had any reason to assign why sentence should not be passed upon him—I refer to Fagin the Jew, I think in Oliver Twist—his reply was he was a very old man.

Several MEMBERS. How old?

Mr. WRIGHT. He was some ninety or ninety-five—I am not quite up to ninety yet—and the court took Fagin's excuse into consideration. Now, my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who does not often occupy the time of the House with any remarks, has volunteered to appear as my counsel. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] did so also, but he wanted to charge me $100. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want to know if the gentleman had labored eight hours?

Mr. WILBER. I scarcely think the excuse just offered is a valid one. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the father of the House, he should have been here to see after his boys.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I return my sincere acknowledgments to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BROWNE. None whatever; except that I went out of the House, and when I came back I found the doors closed against me and I could not get in. I think the House owes me an apology for refusing to allow me to come upon the floor. I anxiously sought admission for an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the House?

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I move that the excuse of the gentleman from Indiana be accepted, and that he be discharged from further custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. REED, of Maine, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, about six o'clock I found myself suffering under temporary nervous prostration, and I left the House. On my way from the House I got into a discourse on finance with a stranger. Of course that delayed me. But I got home, and when I returned to my surprise I found the door of the House barred against me, and it has been so for the last half hour, or perhaps hour. In any other assembly than this I should expect an apology; but under the circumstances I am willing to be released, and call it square at that.

Mr. McMAHON. In view of what the stranger had to suffer I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs. [Great laughter.]

Mr. REED. The kind providence of the House comes in too late for the stranger. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I accept the apology of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HUMPHREY, of Wisconsin, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HUMPHREY. My only excuse is this: That I was here until six o'clock when I went for my dinner. I got my dinner and returned to the House and found the door was barred.

Mr. STEELE. Which was in accordance with the eternal fitness of things.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. JOYCE, of Vermont, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, I was in the House from eleven o'clock until six. [Cries of louder.] Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be interrupted. [Laughter.] I was in the House from eleven until six; then I went down into the restaurant below to eat. I was gone about fifteen minutes and when I came back I found the door barred.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave; what excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I think the records of the House will show——[Cries of "Louder!"] I hope gentlemen will keep order. As I was about to say when interrupted I think the records of the House will show that for the last four years I have asked no leave of absence and have seldom been away without leave. I have made it a point to be here during the sessions of the House. I stayed here until some time after five o'clock. The amendments became so multifarious and I became confused among them. I confess I ceased to have any very intelligible idea of this bill. My friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] suggests I became multifarious too. No, I became scarce about that time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the gentleman have leave to print. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I am obliged to my friend for his courtesy, but instead of printing, when I get through I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ROBERTSON.]

In this fullness of mind and emptiness of stomach, I went home to my dinner, hoping to think the matter out.

A MEMBER. How do you feel now?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I feel now that if I could get out of this scrape I might vote with great propriety as well on one side of the bill as on the other.

I am afraid this is not a sufficient excuse, and I do not want to leave a subject so momentous incomplete. In all frankness I therefore add that after dinner my wife informed me that my new clothes were ready, and I went down to get them, hurried back as rapidly as possible, and here, in this spick and span new suit am arrested for the first time in my life before the House and the country! [Great laughter.]

Mr. WILBER. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

Mr. REED. I think an example ought to be made. [Laughter.] We have to do something in the way of punishment to put a stop to these absences.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken on Mr. WILBER's motion; and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MILLS, of Texas, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MILLS. It is very rarely that I speak to the House, and I wish to be heard when I speak on such a solemn occasion as this.

A MEMBER. How much time do you wish?

Mr. MILLS. I have been present since the meeting of the House aiding the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to remonetize silver and make the silver dollar a part of the currency of the country, in order that the condition of the laboring people may be somewhat ameliorated, and I became exhausted at six o'clock, and believing the country would be perfectly safe in the hands of my friends and in the keeping of the very distinguished statesmen around me, I went to get something to eat, thinking that I would get back before the roll-call was through. Unfortunately when I came back from my dinner—I was gone only a few moments—the doors of the House were closed against my admittance.

The House must ask itself the reason why myself and my "fellow-criminals" who stand around me were not admitted to this Hall to participate in the grave deliberations in which the House is now engaged, and in which perhaps the fate of the country may be involved.

This is my excuse: that I went to get something to eat.

Mr. BAYNE. I move the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSE. I move that all the remaining members of the House at the bar be discharged from custody. [Loud cries of "Object!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I staid here until five o'clock, and finding the democratic side of the House disposed to filibuster against the silver bill——

Mr. COX. We cannot hear the prisoner.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I should like the offensive language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to be taken down. I ask the protection of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will protect the gentleman.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. While I am in chains, and I do not desire to be insulted.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the word "prisoner," and will say fugitive. [Laughter.]

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I shall be glad to proceed. I staid here until after five o'clock.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, you did.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I then went to get my dinner, and returned voluntarily and found the doors barred against me. I have been trying for an hour to get in.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move the gentleman be discharged without costs.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to make a few remarks on that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. Under what rule? We have always debated these propositions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to discharge a member from custody is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. It has been the practice heretofore, and I want to know if there is any rule that prevents me making a speech?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The whole purpose of the call being to obtain a quorum, if discussion were allowed without limit, there would be no means by which the House could obtain a constitutional quorum.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. If I have any time left I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion being to discharge the member at the bar, the question must be decided without discussion.

The question was taken upon Mr. ANDERSON's motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I shall object now to the ruling of the Chair, so that it may not be regarded hereafter as a precedent. I will not now insist upon my rights.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection will be entered of record, and the Chair will proceed. Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. A little before six o'clock, it being about my usual dinner hour, and I being somewhat hungry, I paired with my friend from Maine, Mr. LINDSEY, and went away to get my dinner. I was not gone very long, but when I returned I found the doors closed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I had been in the House to-day for nearly six hours. For the last hour of the time that I was here it seemed to me that the proceedings were not very important. I went to dinner and returned. I stopped to talk with no stranger of either sex. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARBER. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

Mr. DAGGETT. I move that the gentleman be taken down into the basement of the Capitol and shot. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to discharge from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. LINDSEY, of Maine, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LINDSEY. At half past five o'clock to-day, at the suggestion of my friend from North Carolina, Mr. DAVIS, I agreed to pair with him for the purpose of going to dinner. A little after dinner I returned here and found the doors closed.

Mr. KLOTZ. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. YOCUM, of Pennsylvania, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. YOCUM. I am rather unfortunate in being at the lower end of the list. I would like to ask a question of the Chair. Are old excuses allowed to be used over again by those lower down on the list? [Laughter.] My excuse is that I paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, and went to dinner. I was away about half an hour, and when I came back I found the doors closed.

Mr. KLOTZ. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

Mr. HOUK. I move that he be fined a thousand dollars fiat money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is first on the motion to discharge without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. LADD, of Maine, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LADD. I was exceedingly exhausted, and I went out for a few moments to take lunch. That is all the excuse I can offer.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. The whole delegation from Maine, except Mr. MURCH, have been under arrest. I move that he be fined ten dollars for his stupidity in remaining here. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order. Mr. OSMER, of Pennsylvania, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. OSMER. I was in attendance upon the House all day, until some time after six o'clock. Being hungry, I went to the lunch-room, and was absent some ten minutes. When I came back I found the doors closed.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the gentleman be excused and discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to ask this question: All the gentlemen who have been arraigned before the House to-night for being absent without leave surrendered to the Sergeant-at-Arms. Now, the Sergeant-at-Arms should not have the credit of making those arrests.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. My point of order is that the motion to adjourn at this time is not in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am informed that my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. BAYNE, has got in through that door [pointing to the door] surreptitiously. [Laughter.] When the prisoners were being brought in by the Sergeant-at-Arms my colleague came in also in the column of advancing criminals, and seated himself in the House. My point of order is that he has got in here illegitimately and improperly. [Laughter.] I want the gentleman to state how he got into the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call upon the gentleman to answer it.

Mr. COOK. Have a committee of investigation appointed. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I object to any one turning State's evidence to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BAYNE, is among the list of absentees.

Mr. VALENTINE. He has been here participating in the action of the House. He moved, I believe, the discharge of one member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is technically absent.

Mr. WILBER. He has not been arrested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to take him into custody and bring him to the bar of the House. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, that the House adjourn.

Mr. KENNA. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the motion to adjourn is not in order, and I ask the ruling of the Chair distinctly upon it. It has been put here half a dozen times during this call, and now I want a ruling upon it. I submit that an adjournment cannot be reached by this method at the present time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By rulings heretofore made it has been held that pending the proceedings in a call but two motions are admissible in addition to those incident to the call. Those two motions are a motion to adjourn and a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call. This being one of the motions recognized heretofore as in order, the Chair entertains it.

Mr. KENNA. Does the Chair desire to be understood as holding that the motion is in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds that it is strictly in order.

Mr. BAYNE. Allow me to say one word before the question is put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE,] under the rules of the House, is not regarded as present, and cannot be recognized by the Chair. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey that the House adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 64, noes 85.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it now too late to appeal from the ruling of the Chair deciding that pending proceedings under a call of the House a call of the yeas and nays may be had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late now to raise that question. The House is now dividing.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to adjourn; there being ayes 46, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYNE, when his name was called, voted "ay."

Mr. REAGAN. I object to the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] being received, because under the rules he is not entitled to vote. The rule expressly prohibits the reception of his vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be recorded.

Mr. HAWLEY. I submit that, the member being actually to our knowledge here in person, it would be right to call him before the bar and allow him to make his excuse.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring him before the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. I happen to know (and I feel at liberty to say it in behalf of the gentleman, though he has not asked me to do so) that he walked into this House without the slightest objection on the part of any officer. He came in without any fault on his part, and is now here claiming his rights as a member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain any motion until the roll-call is completed.

Mr. WHITE. In behalf of my colleague [Mr. BAYNE] I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No question can be entertained pending the roll-call.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. Shall these gentlemen who are in contempt vote to adjourn, and thus relieve themselves?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided (and that decision must be accepted without appeal pending the roll-call) that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not entitled to vote.

Mr. COX. Why should the Clerk call the names of members who are in contempt of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen who have been excused are entitled to vote. The Clerk must call the names on the roll as he finds them; he cannot discriminate.

Mr. BAYNE. I will relieve these punctilious gentlemen by withdrawing my vote.

The Clerk then resumed and concluded the call of the roll, there being—yeas 68, nays 91, not voting 126; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CLARDY. I am paired with Mr. MULLER, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN.

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi, is paired with Mr. STONE, of Michigan.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. WASHBURN, of Minnesota. If he were, I should vote "no."

Mr. HURD. I am paired with Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. NEWBERRY, of Michigan.

Mr. SIMONTON. Mr CLYMER is paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. COBB. I am paired with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. YOCUM. I am paired with Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. BREWER is paired with Mr. GUNTER.

Mr. SAPP. Mr. PRICE is absent by leave of the House. If he were here, I am confident he would would vote "ay."

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. LORING is paired with Mr. HOOKER, of Mississippi.

Mr. EINSTEIN. Mr. O'BRIEN is paired with Mr. ACKLEN, of Louisiana.

Mr. NORCROSS. Mr. RICE is paired with Mr. ELAM.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. TUCKER is paired with Mr. LAPHAM.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The deputy Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody, under its order, Mr. BAYNE, of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BAYNE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BAYNE. I remained here until half past five o'clock and went to get something to eat. When I returned after dinner I found the doors locked.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that my colleague be excused without the payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to know from my colleague how he managed to get in when the doors were locked?

Mr. BAYNE. Why, I walked in. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I can claim the right of sanctuary inside of the Hall, for I surrendered myself to relieve the officers from any embarrassment whatever. They are capable and efficient officers, and I would do nothing to reflect upon their attention to their duty.

Mr. WRIGHT. How did you get in?

Mr. BAYNE. As I have told my colleague already, I walked in.

The deputy Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody, under its order, Mr. BELTZHOOVER, Mr. STONE, Mr. FROST, Mr. BOWMAN, Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts, and Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BELTZHOOVER, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. My excuse, Mr. Speaker, is about this: I have sat out all of the roll-calls and all of the sittings of this House during the present extra session; but to-day at six o'clock, when the last roll-call was taking place, I went home to dinner. I was exhausted, worn out, tired, and reckoned without my host in leaving, believing that there would be no roll-call before I got back from dinner. When I returned at seven o'clock I found the doors closed and was unable to get in.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that my colleague be discharged without payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. STONE, of Michigan, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STONE. Mr. Speaker, about five o'clock the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in charge of the silver bill announced that if the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered he would consent to an adjournment. The roll-call was then ordered for adjournment. Mr. MONEY, not being well, desired to pair with me and I consented and we left the House together, supposing an adjournment would immediately follow. I had supposed the House was adjourned until about five minutes ago, when I was told at my room that my presence was required here, and I came.

Mr. SAPP. I move the gentleman be discharged without payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. FROST, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, about five o'clock, immediately after the announcement made by the gentleman from Ohio in charge of the silver bill, which I construed into an intimation that an adjournment would be consented to on his part, at the solicitation of my friend from New York, [Mr. EINSTEIN,] who was anxious to secure a pair, I consented to pair with him, and left the House under the impression that an adjournment would soon occur. Had I known the House was in session, I should have returned sooner.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I move the gentleman be discharged without payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BOWMAN, of Massachusetts, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BOWMAN. During all the afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I with great faithfulness listened to all the amendments to the silver bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois and others, and in the frantic endeavor to understand what the bill meant, without being able to see it in print, I became exhausted.

Mr. STEELE. Would you have understood it if you had seen it in print?

Mr. BOWMAN. I therefore, at an hour when my dinner I knew had already grown cold, hurried across the square, ate it as rapidly as I could, and betook myself again to where I saw the light in the cupola, which was the only indication I had that the House continued in session. I may add that I did not come under arrest, but voluntarily.

Mr. COX. I move that the gentleman's disabilities be removed. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves that the gentleman from Massachusetts be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I left the House about a quarter before six to get my dinner, requesting the assistant doorkeeper to send word to me if the roll should be called. I only crossed the street to get my dinner. I was very expeditious in dining and ever since that I have been trying to come into the House. I may add that I came here not under arrest, but voluntarily.

Mr. NORCROSS. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MARTIN, of North Carolina, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MARTIN, of North Carolina. I appear before you, Mr. Speaker, not as a criminal. I have not been arrested. I came voluntarily, having heard a few moments ago that the House was in session. I left this evening in consequence of a severe headache from which I am still suffering.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is mistaken as to his not being under arrest.

Mr. SCALES. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. McMAHON. There are more than fifty members out yet. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. COX. Let us be just to everybody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The effect of this motion if carried in the affirmative would be to cause the doors to be opened and to discharge the members who are now under arrest and in custody. It also will bring the House to a direct vote on the motion which was pending, that is, the demand for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the silver bill.

Mr. WHITE. Is it in order now to move to postpone to a future time the consideration of that motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CONGER. If the Sergeant-at-Arms has any other gentleman to report I withdraw the motion.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I renew the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call, and hope it will be voted down in order that I may raise the point whether or not it is in order to call the yeas and nays pending proceedings under a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the House take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. SPARKS. I understand there are other gentlemen under arrest at the door. Why are they not brought in?

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in his custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. BLISS, Mr. CHITTENDEN, Mr. ATHERTON, and Mr. KNOTT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BLISS, of New York, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. EWING. Tell the truth; do not be afraid.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, I will tell the truth. [Laughter.] This is the first call of the House that has found me absent since I became a member, and I only left on this occasion to attend to some very important business.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that my colleague be discharged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed to state what excuse he has to offer.

Mr. WILBER. The gentleman has stated his excuse. He has said he had important business.

Mr. McMAHON. Where ignorance is bliss——

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, I had other reasons.

Mr. WRIGHT. Prove an alibi. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLISS. I have other reasons if necessary, one of which is that I did not think that it was possible to transact any business in the short time I intended to be absent. And I had still another reason. I did not regard what was being done at the time I left, only an hour ago, to be of sufficient importance to keep any member of Congress at such a late hour.

Mr. WRIGHT. That won't hold water.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that my colleague be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New York, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have to say I was busily employed preparing a speech on the coinage bill. For the rest I refer to my counsel.

A MEMBER. Who is your counsel?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN, is my counsel.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have had no retainer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion the gentleman cannot appear by counsel; he must answer for himself. The Chair therefore again asks him what excuse he has to offer?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am a man of few words, and have told you all. I have told you the exact truth and have nothing to add to it.

Mr. COVERT. I move that my colleague be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. ATHERTON, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ATHERTON. Mr. Speaker, at the usual hour of closing the session of the House I paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MORSE, supposing the business of the House was about concluded. In addition to that I suffer considerable pain on account of a wound in my foot which I find much easier at home than in this House.

Mr. COX. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. KNOTT, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. KNOTT. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the middle of the afternoon I was requested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] to pair with him, as he found it necessary from some cause to leave the House. I did so with a great deal of pleasure. I remained here untill about half past four o'clock.

A MEMBER. Tell us a good anecdote and that will do. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must not be interrupted during the time he is making his excuse.

Mr. GEDDES. I move the reference of the matter to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. KNOTT. I had not completed my statement.

Mr. MILLS. Let the gentleman recite his Duluth speech, and I rewe will excuse him.

Mr. KNOTT. I am not quite through. As I was remarking, then mained here until half past four o'clock.

Mr. WRIGHT. You said that once before. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNOTT. I thought that there was an amicable arrangement about to be concluded between the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] [great laughter,] and I went home.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to excusing the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. KNOTT? The Chair hears none, and the gentleman is excused.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in his custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. HASKELL, Mr. ORTH, Mr. BUCKNER, Mr. BREWER, Mr. ACKLEN, and Mr. RICHARDSON of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HASKELL, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HASKELL. If the House will be quiet I will state the reason for my absence. I am unable to talk with my usual voice. I desire to say that owing to a temporary illness I paired with the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] and went to my room, supposing that the House would very soon adjourn. I have no other excuse than that to offer.

Mr. COOK. I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. ORTH, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ORTH. It is simply a case of misplaced confidence. I had confidence that the House would have had the good sense to adjourn at the usual hour, but I find that my confidence was misplaced.

Mr. BROWNE. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BUCKNER you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BUCKNER. I was paired with Mr. PRICE, of Iowa, who is absent, and supposing the House would adjourn, and as I was hungry and wanted to get my dinner I left the House. I have no other excuse to offer.

Mr. SAPP. I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BREWER you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock my wife was here and I found her ill. I came in and my friend from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] kindly consented to pair with me. We were voting then on a motion to adjourn. I supposed the House would adjourn and when I got home, supposing that the House had adjourned, I did not return. I am sorry I did not return if the House has been kept in session for the want of my presence.

Mr. BROWNE. I move the gentleman be excused. He is solid.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. ACKLEN, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RICHMOND. Let him give it in the morning hour.

Mr. ACKLEN. The morning hour can take care of itself.

The House is aware that a short time ago I was suffering very much from a severe attack of illness. I was not well this afternoon and furthermore I was paired with Mr. O'BRIEN on this bill. I went home and was found at my room by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I was satisfied in my own mind that the Sergeant-at-Arms was neither to be bribed nor intimidated, so I came along with him very peaceably and I am here to ask the House to excuse me.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York, and left for dinner about the time that the House usually adjourns. I did not know that the House had continued its session until a few moments ago. I came back of my own volition, and was not arrested.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. [Loud cries of "Oh, no!"]

Here the deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House having other members in custody.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DICKEY. I ask leave of absence for the remainder of the legislative session, on account of illness.

There was no objection; and leave was granted.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House and reported that pursuant to the order of the House he had in custody Mr. MULLER, of New York, and Mr. GUNTER, of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MULLER, of New York, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MULLER. I was paired with Mr. CLARDY, of Missouri, and went down home to get my dinner.

Mr. COOK. You do not look as if you had had any. [Laughter.]

Mr. MULLER. That is the only excuse I have to offer.

Mr. COX. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

The mo ion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. GUNTER, of Arkansas, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GUNTER. I was a little unwell this morning, and ate a very light breakfast. I paired with Mr. BREWER, of Michigan, and at six o'clock went home for my dinner. I did not get back here until the doors were closed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. I would like to inquire what is the penalty in case a member is arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms and escapes from his custody?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House must fix the punishment for such an offense.

Mr. STONE. I move that a report be made of the escapes, if any.

Mr. ROBESON. If proceedings under this call are to be continued, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to report any escape.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to report to the House those in his custody, and the Chair supposes he will do so.

Mr. McMAHON. I would inquire of the Sergeant-at-Arms if any person he has taken in charge has failed to report with him to the House? I want to see no favoritism in this matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Sergeant-at-Arms when he is here; he is not now present.

Mr. McMAHON. I want information on that point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the deputy sergeant-at-arms informs the Chair that he had in his custody Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio, and Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts. By some oversight those gentlemen are now temporarily out of his custody.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to inquire whether the Sergeant-at-Arms needs the assistance of troops? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. We are prepared to vote him any assistance necessary.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I have a violent headache to-night, Mr. Speaker, from going so long without anything to eat. I am paired with Mr. HARRY WHITE, and I ask to be excused for the remainder of to-night's session. I am paired with HARRY WHITE, recollect. [Laughter.]

There being no objection, Mr. THOMAS TURNER was excused from further attendance.

Mr. CONGER. I would inquire of the Sergeant-at-Arms if any other gentlemen were in his custody who have not appeared at the bar of the House? I have seen at the door of the House another gentleman who was among the list of absentees. I wish to know whether he was there under arrest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms is not now present. The Chair presumes he is engaged in executing the order of the House.

Mr. ROBESON, (at nine o'clock and five minutes p. m.) I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 45, noes 99.

Mr. CONGER. I renew my inquiry. As a member of this House I have a right to know of the Sergeant-at-Arms if any others than those he has reported have been arrested and not brought before this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have the Sergeant-at-Arms report to him.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms here appeared at the bar of the House and reported that pursuant to the order of the House he had in custody Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York.

Mr. CONGER. Before the case of this gentleman is disposed of I wish to have an answer to my inquiry.

The DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts, was brought up here, but he went away.

Mr. CONGER. I saw some other gentlemen here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will report to the Chair.

The DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no knowledge of any other persons arrested and not brought to the bar of the House except Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. MORSE.

Mr. McMAHON. Have those gentlemen escaped from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only business in order now is receiving excuses. Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have a great many.

Mr. WRIGHT. One good one will do. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. In the first place, a hungry greenbacker tempted me and I paired off with him, so that he might go to dinner. In the second place, I had a slight attack of hunger myself, and went to dinner. In the third place, I thought that our friend from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] who runs this House and has been running it for the last three weeks, was going to adjourn it; he intimated as much. I did not suppose that the session would last more than a few moments longer, and having paired off with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. YOCUM,] I left the House. I supposed that the House had adjourned until I learned that it was still in session, when I came here of my own accord. I found the doors closed and could not get in. I knocked, and they were not opened, so I took a seat in the gallery and have been listening to the various interesting proceedings of to-night. I have not been under arrest.

Mr. DWIGHT. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GODSHALK, (at nine o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion, there were—ayes 44, noes 105.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I rise to a point of order. There has been no declaration from the Chair that proceedings under the call of the House have been dispensed with; and I raise the question of order that pending proceedings under a call it is not in order to move for a call of the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and would like to be heard.

Mr. CONGER. I think the gentleman had better not, for party purposes, pervert the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Constitution of the United States provides that the yeas and nays shall be taken upon any question on the demand of one-fifth of the members present.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Is there any provision of the Constitution of the United States or any rule of the House which forbids an appeal from the ruling of the Chair on this subject?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order for the gentleman to appeal.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. On that motion I want to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman appeals from the decision of the Chair. He will state his point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The point of order which I suggest for the consideration of the Chair and the House is that pending the execution of any order of the House it is not competent to call for the yeas and nays. Now, I do not pretend to be very profoundly versed in that strange medley of legal mysteries that is dignified by the name of the rules under which we are governed; but it seems to me it must be apparent to the mind of every one——[Cries of "Regular order."] The regular order is to hear me. If gentlemen will be quiet a little while, I will subside. [Laughter.] It has been the practice of this House, I believe it is the rule of the House, that the call of the yeas and nays cannot be interrupted by any other business; and I am unable to conceive any principle on which another order of the House unexecuted can be interrupted by a call of the yeas and nays. It may be that there are other gentlemen in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Suppose, while they are in his custody——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Tennessee that all questions of order pending a call must be decided without debate.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I am not discussing the question of order, but the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to lay my appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desired the gentleman from Tennessee to state the question upon which he appealed from the decision of the Chair. The gentleman has now made that statement, but the Chair has not submitted the question, so that the motion to lay on the table is not in order at this time. The Chair merely asked the gentleman to state what ruling of the Chair he appealed from.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair declaring it to be in order to call for the yeas and nays pending proceedings under a call of the House. The gentleman from Georgia moves to lay my appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon this point of order the Chair will ask the Clerk to read the third paragraph of section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will also read Rule 44.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE 44. A motion to adjourn, and a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, shall be always in order; these motions, and the motion to lie on the table, shall be decided without debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his point of order?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair overrules it, and will state to the gentleman that it is not debatable.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I want to appeal from the decision of the Chair overruling the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman may appeal, but he cannot discuss any question of order before the House.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I am not discussing the point of order, but the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to lay my appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In a call of the House all subsidiary questions must be decided without debate.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask that my appeal from the decision of the Chair be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that it is in order to demand the yeas and nays upon a motion to adjourn pending a call of the House. From this decision the gentleman from Tennessee appeals.

The SPEAKER pro tempore was proceeding to put the question, when

Mr. BLACKBURN said: Mr. Speaker, what is the question upon which we are to vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] raised the point that it was not in order to demand the yeas and nays on that motion, and the Chair decided that under the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the House it was in order for one-fifth of those present to demand the yeas and nays on any question. From that decision of the Chair the gentleman from Tennessee has taken an appeal.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did not the gentleman from Georgia move to lay that appeal upon the table?

Mr. BLOUNT. I did.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The pending question then is to lay upon the table the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon. He did not hear the motion to lay on the table. The Chair will put the question upon laying upon the table the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 21.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

The question then recurred on the demand for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 94, not voting 116; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. COVERT. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY, is paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. STONE.

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN, of New York.

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island.

Mr. ATHERTON. I am paired with Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. VOORHIS.

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. SHELLEY is paired with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. NEWBERRY, of Michigan. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, is paired with Mr. O'REILLY, of New York.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. KING. I am paired with Mr. EINSTEIN, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. WASHBURN, of Minnesota.

Mr. HASKELL. I am paired with Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky.

Mr. STONE. I was paired with Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi; but after he left the House I arranged a pair for him with Mr. CROWLEY, of New York. I have therefore voted.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. EINSTEIN, of New York, is paired with Mr. KING, of Louisiana.

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey.

Mr. COBB. I am paired with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

Mr. CHALMERS. My colleague from Mississippi, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

Mr. NORCROSS. My colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. RICE, is paired with Mr. ELAM.

Mr. HURD. I am paired with Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama.

Mr. KNOTT. When I voted I was under the impression that the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HUBBELL, with whom I was paired, had been brought in under arrest, as well as myself. I find that is not so, and I withdraw my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in his custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. O'CONNOR and Mr. ERRETT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. O'CONNOR, of South Carolina, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with Mr. O'REILLY, of New York, for the day. I left the House at half past four o'clock for my dinner. As soon as I was apprised, at nine o'clock this evening, of the House being in session I repaired hither, and was arrested outside the bar of the House a moment ago.

Mr. ACKLEN. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ERRETT. I have no excuse except that I was hungry and went home to get my dinner.

Mr. HAZELTON. That will scarcely do.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

Mr. HAZELTON. I wish to inquire what the amount of costs would probably be?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That depends on the order of the House.

The motion of Mr. BAYNE was agreed to.

Mr. ORTH. I do not feel well enough to remain longer in the House. I therefore ask leave of absence for the balance of the legislative day.

There was no objection, and leave of absence was granted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague from Georgia, Mr. NICHOLLS, who has been for several weeks confined to his room on account of his eyes and has only come out a few days ago.

Mr. CONGER. I object to any further leave of absence till we have seen whether others of us laboring under infirmity and weariness cannot be permitted to return to our homes.

Mr. SPARKS. Is the gentleman from Michigan ill?

Mr. CONGER. I do not hear the remark of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will not object to leave of absence being granted to my colleague.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my objection to the request made by the gentleman from Georgia.

There being no further objection, leave of absence was granted to Mr. NICHOLLS.

Mr. WILBER. I suggest that we all be excused.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in his custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RICE. I do not think I have any.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman states he has no excuse to offer for being absent from the sitting of the House. What is the pleasure of the House?

Mr. SPARKS. I move that he be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken on Mr. CONGER's motion; and there were—ayes 48, noes 84.

Mr. SPARKS. Can the Chair inform the House what progress is being made under the call? It was stated some time ago that some of the delinquents had been arrested and had made their escape. Is that a fact?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that two members who were in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms——

Mr. SPARKS. Who were those?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio, and Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to know if there is any further report from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms has reported to the Chair that he understood those gentlemen to be in his custody; but when he made his report at the bar he found they were not, and he has not been able to arrest them again and bring them to the bar of the House. He has been endeavoring to do so.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand that Mr. MORSE, of Massachusettts, did not understand he was in custody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen can present their excuses when they are brought to the bar.

Mr. SPARKS. I wanted to make this inquiry: what report did the Sergeant-at-Arms make, if any?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What the Chair has already stated.

Mr. SPARKS. That he arrested them and they have escaped?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No. The Chair stated that the Sergeant-at-Arms understood he had them under arrest, but when he reported to the House he found they were not here. But there may have been some mistake in the matter.

Mr. MCMAHON. They were standing at that door, both of them.

Mr. BOWMAN. As the name of my colleague, Mr. MORSE, has been mentioned, and it has been alleged that he escaped from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, I think that I ought in justice to him to explain the circumstances. I met Mr. MORSE in the lobby. He had come voluntarily. He desired me to state that he was paired on all questions about this bill with Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania; and then he went away. I do not think he understood that he was technically in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and I think the Sergeant-at-Arms will say that he never officially notified Mr. MORSE that he held him in his custody and under arrest.

Mr. CONGER. Never.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Hardly ever.

A VOICE. Kill him.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That excuse was considered a good one when it came from Ohio, but coming from Boston it is not a sufficient one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] asks leave of absence for the remainder of the legislative day on account of the illness of his wife.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. CARLISLE. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear it read.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its introduction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not know what the resolution is, and if it is in order the Chair will rule it in order.

Mr. CONGER. No business is in order but the call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not know if the resolution relates to the call of the House.

Mr. WARNER. It relates to the call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot rule upon the resolution until the Clerk reads it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That further proceedings under the call of the House be postponed and made the special order for to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms at that time bring in and report to the House the absentees, if any, not yet reported.

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point of order that we cannot take a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The effect of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] would be to take a recess, which cannot be done under the rules at this time. The Chair therefore rules the resolution out of order.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWK] desires leave of absence for the remainder of the legislative day. Members understand his infirmity, and the Chair hopes that there will be no objection.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. WAIT, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WAIT. I received a telegram asking me to meet a gentleman on business from my district, and I went down to meet him. When I learned that the House had not adjourned, as I supposed it was about to do when I left, I did myself the pleasure and honor of coming at once and appearing before this body and yourself, its distinguished presiding officer.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that my colleague be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to inquire whether a motion for a recess would be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be at this time.

Mr. WARNER. I now move to dispense with further proceedings under the call for the purpose of going on with the business before the House.

Mr. CONGER, (at ten o'clock and forty-five minutes, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 65, nays 96, not voting 124; as follows:

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. NEWBERRY, of Michigan. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no" and he would vote "ay."

Mr. KNOTT. I am paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. COBB. I am paired with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, and my colleague, Mr. COLERICK, is paired with Mr. BALLOU, of Rhode Island.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. LORING, is paired with Mr. HOOKER, of Mississippi.

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am paired with Mr. PRICE, of Iowa.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. EINSTEIN is paired with Mr. KING, of Louisiana.

Mr. STONE. Mr. CROWLEY is paired with Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi.

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. BOWMAN. My colleague, Mr. MORSE, is paired with Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, is paired with Mr. CONVERSE, of Ohio.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. Pending the question on that motion, the Chair has been requested by Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, to ask that he be allowed leave of absence for the remainder of this legislative day on account of illness. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. ACKLEN. I also ask permission to be absent for the remainder of this day's session. I am paired with Mr. O'BRIEN, of New York.

Mr. CONGER. I object. We are all wearied, and I think we will soon adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. WHITE. Before the vote is taken on that motion I desire to have the names read of those gentlemen who were absent on the last roll-call. I have a right to that information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. WHITE. I do not ask unanimous consent.

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

Mr. WHITE. I do not ask unanimous consent; I ask it as a right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has no such right under the rule.

Mr. WHITE. I have a right to such information before the vote is taken on the pending motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a right of the gentleman under the rule. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. WARNER. I make the motion with a view to proceeding with the business before the House.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WARNER; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 40.

Mr. WARNER. I now call for the regular order.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I call for tellers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The call is too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] had only been announced when the call was made for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understood the Chair to state there was a call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays takes precedence, and was made in time.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were but 13 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WARNER. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All further proceedings under the call having been dispensed with by a vote of the House, the doors will now be opened. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill providing for silver certificates, &c.

Mr. CONGER, (at eleven o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) Pending that motion I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ACKLEN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] withdraws his objection to my being excused for the remainder of to-day's session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection?

Mr. FARR. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 49, noes 67.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 45 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 68, nays 90, not voting 127; as follows:

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] for the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SCALES. My colleague, Mr. VANCE, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. WILLITS, of Michigan.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with Mr. COWGILL.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. DUNN is paired with Mr. COVERT.

Mr. COVERT. I am paired with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York. If he were here I should vote "no."

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. NEWBERRY. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. ROSS.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts, is paired with Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania; and Mr. LORING, of Massachusetts, is paired with Mr. HOOKER, of Mississippi.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Mr. KEIFER, of Ohio, is paired with Mr. ROTHWELL, of Missouri.

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. How that distinguished gentleman would vote if he were bodily present I cannot say, but I should vote "ay."

Mr. WHITE. I am paired with the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. THOMAS TURNER. How he would vote, I cannot say. I am exceedingly anxious myself to adjourn and go home.

Mr. BROWNE. I am paired with Mr. CHALMERS. If he were here, I should vote to go home.

Mr. COBB. I am paired with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, and my colleague, Mr. COLERICK, is paired with Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. ALDRICH, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN.

Mr. HURD. I am paired with Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before announcing the result the Chair is requested to ask leave of absence for the remainder of the legislative day for Mr. COBB, of Indiana. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. Is he present?

A MEMBER. He is, but he is quite indisposed.

Mr. CONGER. Then I have no objection.

No objection being made, the leave was granted.

Mr. KNOTT. Before the vote is announced, I desire to say that I came here this evening laboring under a very sick headache, and that headache has been aggravated by my attendance here. I am paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan, and I ask to be excused from attendance for the remainder of the legislative day.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is here and we have a great deal of trouble to get a quorum. I have suffered a great deal myself, but I will not object to excusing Mr. KNOTT if he is sick.

There was no objection, and Mr. KNOTT was excused.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. WARNER that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Acklen,	Dick,	Kimmel,	Prescott,
Aldrich, N. W.	Dickey,	Kitchin,	Price,
Aldrich, William	Dunn,	Knott,	Ross,

Colerick,	Keifer,	Orth,	Young, Casey.
Cowgill,	Kelley,	Overton,
Cox,	Ketcham,	Pierce,
Crowley,	Killinger,	Pound,

Mr. BREWER. When I came here this evening and rendered my excuse it was that my absence was on account of the sickness of my wife. I left her quite ill, and she is entirely alone, and I ask to be excused from further attendance upon this session.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. WASHBURN is paired with Mr. CONVERSE.

Mr. HOSTETLER. My colleague, Mr. COBB, is absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. Excuses are not now in order.

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is necessarily absent.

The SPEAKER. The doors of the Hall will now be closed.

Mr. REAGAN. I submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The warrant will be prepared and delivered to the Sergeant-at-Arms in accordance with the resolution just adopted.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask consent to make a statement. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks consent to make a statement to the House. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to submit to this House a proposition which I hope will prove a solvent of the present difficulty. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the democratic side.] I ask you, gentlemen, to hear me before you strike. We have been in session here for seven hours, and have made no progress toward reaching a vote on this bill.

Mr. MCMAHON. Over twelve hours.

Mr. BELFORD. More than seven hours since this contest began. I voted with you, gentlemen, [addressing the democratic side,] and therefore I appeal to you to accept the proposition of a friend of this bill. The desire of the House is to have this bill printed that we may know what it really is when we come to a vote on it. I therefore submit this proposition to the gentleman who has the bill in charge, [Mr. WARNER,] that he allow the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] which was offered a few days ago and printed in the RECORD, to be considered pending to the bill; that he then call for the previous question; that the bill with the amendment be printed in the RECORD, and we can then vote on the bill to-morrow. What are we to gain if we proceed here for the next twelve hours as we are going on now? I make this proposition in the interest of peace. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the democratic side.]

Mr. HURD. I desire to submit a proposition to the House.

Mr. WARNER. The issue is made up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman. No harm can come from listening.

Mr. HURD. The hard-money democrats——

Mr. LOWE. Does this require unanimous consent?

Mr. WHITE. The Chair wants to hear.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may be raising a point of order. The Chair does not know.

Mr. LOWE. I object.

The SPEAKER. To what?

Mr. LOWE. To the gentleman making any statement that is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot state whether the gentleman rises to a point of order until the Chair hears his statement.

Mr. HURD. I rise to a point of order, in the hope of submitting a proposition to the House which will settle this difficulty.

Mr. MCMAHON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is now being executed.

Mr. HURD. I desire to address gentlemen on this side of the House——

Mr. MCMAHON. The gentleman does not represent this side of the House.

Mr. HURD. I represent twenty democrats on this side of the House who believe in hard money.

Mr. EWING. Are the hard-money democrats opposed to coining silver dollars?

Mr. HURD. I am in favor of coining honest silver dollars.

Mr. WARNER. The issue has been made up. The offer was made that the bill should be printed. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WHITE. I call for the regular order if the gentleman will not allow his colleague to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is being proceeded with.

Mr. KENNA. I submit to the Chair and to the House that the gentleman cannot make a statement here that requires unanimous consent if objection is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always disposed to listen, and will continue to listen, when a member rises and states as a Representative on this floor that he wants to submit a point of order.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman stated that he wanted to submit a point of order so that he could submit a proposition to the House. I submit that that is not a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot say what is or what is not a point of order until he hears it. The Chair does not propose to cut off any rights which members have.

Many MEMBERS on the democratic side. "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. The regular order is being proceeded with, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is in possession of the warrant of the Speaker and is proceeding now to do his duty.

Mr. MCMAHON. I object to the transaction of any other business.

After some time,

Mr. CONGER, (at one o'clock a. m., Saturday.) I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the RECORD for to-morrow, Saturday, will not contain the proceedings of this House further than to this hour. I therefore ask that this bill in its present form be printed in the RECORD to be issued to-morrow morning. I suppose the proceedings of this legislative day's session will be divided, a portion published in to-morrow's RECORD and the remainder published afterward.

Mr. WARNER. Let us vote on the previous question, and then that can be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] which is that the bill as it now is shall be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow, Saturday. Is there objection?

Mr. WARNER. There is objection. Let the previous question be entertained, and then the bill can go into the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. Would there be any impropriety in my asking permission of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to look at the engrossed copy of the bill for a moment?

The SPEAKER. That gentleman has not the custody of the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman had it a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. If the engrossed copy of the bill is here the gentleman can come forward and look at it.

Mr. CONGER. I did not know that I could do that without the permission of the leader of the House.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman is relieved from that embarrassment.

Mr. CONGER. What remark did the gentleman make?

Mr. KENNA. Did the gentleman ask what remark I made?

Mr. CONGER. That is my question.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman will find it in the RECORD in the morning.

Mr. CONGER, (after a pause.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether the Sergeant-at-Arms will be prepared to report soon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not heard from him at all.

Mr. CONGER. Would there be any impropriety in sending a messenger to inquire?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do so. [After a pause.] The Sergeant-at-Arms reports that he has six messengers out in search of members.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to suggest that if it could be intimated to those messengers to examine the committee-rooms and the porticoes of this Capitol, perhaps they might report sooner. [After an interval.] Mr. Speaker, as this seems to be the morning hour, perhaps the bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] in regard to the removal of causes from the State courts to the United States courts might be brought up now. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not now in his seat.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, (who had just entered the Hall.) Do I understand that the gentleman from Michigan desires to take up the bill repealing certain sections of the Revised Statutes authorizing the removal of causes from the State courts? Do I understand that to be the proposition of the gentleman?

Mr. CONGER. That was the subject of an inquiry. If the Chair will rule this to be the morning hour, we could go on with the gentleman's bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am willing to accept the proposition of the gentleman and have the bill now taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] who has charge of the bill under consideration, objects.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Did I understand the gentleman from Michigan to make a motion to that effect?

The SPEAKER. The motion would not now be in order. A call of the House is now proceeding; and only two motions are in order—a motion to adjourn and a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If we get the bill of the gentleman from Illinois through in time, members might be remanded to the State courts when brought in here.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain a motion to that effect. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Speaker, would a resolution be in order? It is with reference to the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it could be received.

Mr. STONE. Let it be read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to have a resolution read.

Several members objected.

Mr. MORTON. I ask consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a joint resolution in reference to the international exhibition at Melbourne, Australia, during the present and the coming year. I ask that the resolution be read.

Mr. WARNER. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I see that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who has charge of this bill is now in the Hall; and I desire to ask unanimous consent that the bill and pending amendments be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. There are no pending amendments.

Mr. CONGER. I mean the amendments that are proposed, the amendment, for instance, of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] which by the RECORD is pending.

Mr. VALENTINE. The RECORD shows that it is pending.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to this proposition. It may be the last one that we shall make to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill in its present shape, the demand for the previous question having been made on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time, may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WARNER. As soon as the previous question is seconded.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let me read from the RECORD of May 15:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be received and considered as pending.

The amendment of Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, is as follows:

Now, there has been no action taken on that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It was offered as an amendment to the third section, and the previous question was sustained on that section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the amendment referred to was offered in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. But that does not alter the status of the question. The gentleman from Ohio now precludes the amendment from being voted on by the demand for the previous question, which, if sustained, will cut off the amendment. The question is one for the House to determine.

Mr. CONGER. I am very glad to have the Chair lay the blame of this proceeding upon the gentleman from Ohio. I have thought so myself for some time. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The amendment has been already printed. Why should it be printed again?

Mr. BELFORD. I hope there will be no objection to printing this bill in the RECORD of to-morrow, so that we can all see its present shape. I cannot conceive what objection there can be to this proposition. I do not myself know the present form of the bill, and I know that a large number of gentlemen on our side of the House are exceedingly anxious to read the bill in print. I cannot conceive on what ground any man—I was going to say any reasonable man—can object to this publication.

Mr. WARNER. If gentlemen on the other side will sustain the demand for the previous question and allow the main question to be ordered we will then agree to the printing of the bill in the RECORD and to an adjournment.

Mr. HUMPHREY, (at two o'clock a. m., Saturday.) With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I move the House adjourn. [Laughter.]

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio having charge of this bill to a proposition from this side. The difficulty with us seems to be that we do not fully understand the provisions of this bill. Now, if the gentleman having charge of it will make a lucid explanation of its provisions we might vote on it to-night and go home. Our desire is to understand its provisions. We do not now understand them; and if he will give a succinct, careful, lucid explanation——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Not succinct. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYNE. Well, with a lucid explanation of this measure no doubt we can vote on it to-night.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is sustained and the main question ordered, the gentleman from Ohio will have an hour to close debate.

Mr. WARNER. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. VALENTINE. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] should pair off and go home I think we could settle this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. Sustain the previous question, and we can have the bill read.

Mr. ROBESON. We might take a recess until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. During a call of the House a recess is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. The several gentlemen who differ in views on the silver question agree that I may make from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a report which I was authorized to make some time ago. If that can be done by unanimous consent, I promise to suspend the moment any member is brought in under the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under a call of the House, and only two motions are in order—a motion to adjourn and a motion that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. WARNER. I object; one thing at a time.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I can have the consent of the House, I should like to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON. I object. [Cries of "Withdraw it!"] Very well, I withdraw it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand the objection is now withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia withdraw his objection?

Mr. WILSON. I do.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. KENNA. We do not wish to commit ourselves to any statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. We reserve our right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts cannot bind anybody by what he does. He may pour oil on the waters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not trying to bind anybody. I wish to state what I recollect pretty clearly myself, and I have refreshed my recollection by looking at the RECORD. By reference to the RECORD it will be seen that there was a distinct understanding in the House that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] should be voted on when the bill was concluded. It is clearly and plainly stated in the RECORD. It was repeated three times. I desire to call attention to it, because I think if the friends and opponents of the bill see it clearly they will agree to vote on it. So far as I know, if the vote be taken on that substitute it will carry out in good faith the understanding of the House.

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the previous question is voted down, then that amendment would come in properly.

Mr. CONGER. That has been tried so often and we have lost by it that we are cautious. [Laughter.] We are thankful for the suggestion of the Chair, but it is in a way where we do not wish to go.

Mr. HOUSE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me make my statement. I do not antagonize anybody.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman support the bill if that substitute is voted down?

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me read from the RECORD, and then I will answer the question. I have the right by the courtesy of the House to make a statement, and I will make it in my own way.

Mr. HOUSE. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is too late.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to make a statement not in order when an objection is made.

Mr. KENNA. I expressly reserved the right to object at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia reserved that right.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire to impose on the House, but I wish to show from the RECORD what the House agreed to.

Mr. HOUSE. Now will the gentleman answer me a question? He is offering this substitute. If the substitute is adopted in lieu of the bill will he then in good faith vote for the bill as amended?

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman misconceives my position entirely. I do not offer any amendment myself.

Mr. HOUSE. I speak of the amendment you want to be voted on.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not wanting any amendment voted on. I only want to show from the RECORD that on three different occasions the House has agreed that this amendment should be voted on.

Mr. HOUSE. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I do not desire to make any further statement.

Mr. ROBESON. Do I understand there is objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts informing the House that the House has already agreed it will take a vote on this proposition? The gentleman offers to prove that by the RECORD.

Many members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has repeatedly stated the position of this amendment. It can only come in now by the House voting down the demand for the previous question. If the demand for the previous question is voted down the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Kansas to offer a substitute.

Mr. ROBESON. I only want to state the proposition.

Mr. HOUSE. I object. If gentlemen are not satisfied with the position they are in it is not our fault.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I think I have a right to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen to the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBESON. Well, sir, I desire to ask whether it is not parliamentary for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] to read from the RECORD to show that this House has already agreed by unanimous consent to take a vote upon the proposition which we are now striving to have admitted? We have wasted eight hours here trying to make the House live up to its agreement. I want to know if it is not proper to show by the RECORD that we have a right to vote on that amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has answered that inquiry over and over again. If the gentleman from New Jersey can get a majority in this House to coincide with that view then he has his relief.

Mr. ROBESON. I have no doubt the majority will live up to its agreement if it is clearly shown from the RECORD what that agreement was.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has his remedy if the majority will not second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ROBESON. I only want the House to act up to the understanding that was arrived at.

Mr. WARNER. There was no such understanding.

Mr. HOUSE. I understand there is nothing in order but a motion to adjourn or a motion to suspend further proceedings under the call. If there is any such thing in the RECORD as the gentleman speaks of the country will find it out by reading it there.

Mr. WHITE. I submit there is a strong case of equity raised by the offer made by the gentleman from Massachusetts in connection with what appears in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

Mr. WHITE. Will gentlemen not hear a fair proposition? Is the other side willing to go to the country on a record of that kind?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, we are ready to go to the country upon our record.

Mr. WHITE. We only want the House to do what is fair.

Mr. WARNER. We are willing to go to the country, clear to the Kiskiminetas.

Mr. WHITE. That is a very good record to go to the country on.

Mr. MCMAHON. Does the gentleman in that remark refer to the Kiskiminetas?

Mr. CONGER. I again ask unanimous consent to have the pending bill printed in the RECORD, and also to have printed with it the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] and the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] so that to-morrow we may vote on those three propositions.

A MEMBER. Sit down.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the member who asked me to sit down would rise. His beautiful countenance would illuminate this Hall. Though he did not rise I see him.

Mr. SPRINGER. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. CONGER. Not the gentleman from Illinois. His is not the kind of countenance I was speaking of.

A MEMBER. Name the countenance.

Mr. REED. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. It seems, Mr. Speaker, according to the RECORD of May 15 that on the previous day the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]——

Mr. MANNING. I object.

The SPEAKER. That same point of order has already been made, and has been decided.

Mr. REED. This is a question of the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. REED. I submit the Chair ought to hear what was the action of the House in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The same statement was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Massachusetts was not allowed to make the statement.

Mr. MANNING. I object to the gentleman from Maine proceeding.

Mr. WARNER. I also object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the gentleman from Maine proceeding.

Mr. REED. I submit that in fairness I should be heard on the point of order, which I am making in good faith, believing it to be a sound one.

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

Mr. REED. It does not require unanimous consent to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in order except a motion to adjourn or a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. REED. It seems to me if the Chair would hear me——

Many members objected.

The SPEAKER. There is objection to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. REED. I desire to know if the Chair rules that it is necessary to have unanimous consent to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. At this time he does. The Chair has asked unanimous consent, and there is objection.

Mr. REED. And the Chair rules, then, that unanimous consent is necessary? [Loud cries of "Order!" and "Object!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats that at this time it is necessary.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. No motion is in order except a motion to adjourn or a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call. We have been in a condition of political limbo for two hours and nobody has been arrested, and I therefore move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to, on a division—ayes 55, noes 66.

Mr. SPARKS. What is up?

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] seems to be up.

Mr. SPARKS. It seems to me, although I do not expect to settle this dead-lock——

Mr. HURD. I object.

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, no; hear him.

Mr. HURD. I object.

Mr. SPARKS. Did I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] to object?

Mr. HURD. I do object, sir.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS, (at two o'clock and forty minutes a. m., Saturday.) I move that the House adjourn until Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Speaker please inform the House whether the Sergeant-at-Arms has any report to make? It is suggested that the absentees have captured the Sergeant-at-Arms. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent to inquire.

Mr. HOUK. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [Renewed cries of "Object!"]

Mr. HOUK. I want to ask a question. The fourth section of the bill provides that the price paid for bullion shall be the market value. [Loud cries of "Order!" and "Object!"]

Mr. WHITE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. The House is doing nothing at this time——

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered a call of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is executing his duty, the Chair supposes.

Mr. WHITE. I want to state at this time my reasons for objecting to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do it by unanimous consent. [Loud cries of "Object!"] There is objection, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. I want to get in order by obtaining unanimous consent. [Loud cries of "Sit down!"]

Mr. HOUK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Speaker. I find that the fourth section of this bill——

Many MEMBERS. Object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with the sections of the bill now. The Chair rules upon parliamentary law, not upon the sections of the bill.

Mr. HOUK. Exactly, and that is the very nature of the question want to ask.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] is not in order.

Mr. HOUK. I do not wish to be out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be kind enough to be seated, and then he will not be out of order.

Mr. HOUK, (taking his seat.) Certainly.

Mr. WILBER. I desire to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [Loud cries of "Object!"] The gentleman cannot make any statement without the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. WILBER. It is in regard to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. COOK. We object; the Sergeant-at-Arms can take care of himself.

Mr. WILBER. I am informed that he goes to the rooms of members and knocks at their doors, and they do not answer.

Mr. REED. They say nothing to nobody. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILBER. I want to know what the Sergeant-at-Arms is going to do in such cases?

The SPEAKER. To obey the order of the House, and arrest a member when he finds him and bring him to the bar of the House.

Mr. WILBER. But he cannot find him.

Mr. ROBESON, (at two o'clock and fifty minutes a. m., Saturday.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WARNER. I submit that there has been no intervening business since that motion was voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The last motion was to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The motion to adjourn is now in order.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 61, noes 68.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROBESON and Mr. WARNER were appointed.

Before the tellers took their places,

Mr. SPARKS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty-five members voting therefor, being more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 71, nays 86, not voting 128; as follows:

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague from Tennessee, Mr. YOUNG, has been called away by important business.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CAMP. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "no."

Mr. COVERT. I am paired with the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. DUNN.

Mr. HOSTETLER. My colleague, Mr. COBB, is paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HENDERSON; my colleague, Mr. COLERICK, with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. NEWBERRY.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. WHITTHORNE.

Mr. STONE. The gentleman from New York, Mr. CROWLEY, is paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. ALDRICH, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RYON.

Mr. HOOKER. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LORING.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. COWGILL. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. ATHERTON, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MORSE.

Mr. EWING. The gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SMITH.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WRIGHT. On this question Mr. WRIGHT would vote "no" and I should vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Sergeant-at-Arms made any return on the warrant?

The SPEAKER. He has not yet done so.

Mr. CONGER. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WAIT. I think we have carried this proceeding far enough. I move that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. Is it in order to move to dispense with further proceedings under the call?

The SPEAKER. That motion has just been voted down.

Mr. WHITE, (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m.) If it be entirely in order, I would like to make a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to renew my inquiry whether the Sergeant-at-Arms has been heard from.

The SPEAKER. He has.

Mr. CONGER. And whether there is any prospect of his reporting soon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the Sergeant-at-Arms reports he has visited the residences of twenty-eight members, most of whom cannot be found. Some are sick, and others are out of the city.

A MEMBER. That is "too thin."

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report of any forcible resistance to the Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. HOUSE. I move that the Speaker call the Sergeant-at-Arms before the bar and instruct him as to his duty. I think this is a very thin report.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that he be allowed the posse comitatus.

A MEMBER. And be authorized to call out the troops.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I move that the marines bring back the members who have absented themselves, provided it does not interfere with the freedom of elections.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. As there seems to be no prospect of having any new members brought in, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What further proceedings under the call can there be if the Sergeant-at-Arms can find none of the absentees?

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will be directed to make further search.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not in the power of the House to revoke all pairs?

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House do not recognize pairs.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to arrest absentees without regard to pairs.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms does not recognize pairs.

Mr. ATKINS. That is not my motion. I move that those who are absent although paired be brought in.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms has a list of those absent without leave of the House and he is now proceeding to arrest them. It is not an answer that a member is paired. If absent the Sergeant-at-Arms must bring him here.

Mr. MCMAHON. Warrants are out specifically for those who are absent without leave.

The SPEAKER. Very many of the members arrested and brought to the bar this evening by the Sergeant-at-Arms were paired.

Mr. SPARKS. I understand it is the duty of the Sergeant-at Arms to bring in all absentees who are absent without leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. Such is his duty, and he has visited twice the residences of those who are absent without leave.

Mr. SPARKS. It is wonderful, then, he does not bring some of them before the House.

Mr. HATCH. I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I object.

Mr. HATCH. I insist that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. It can only be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. HATCH. It relates to the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I object.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. If the resolution refers to a call of the House is it not in order?

The SPEAKER. It can be read only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILBER. We will consent to let that be read if you will let us amend it.

Mr. CONGER. Did the warrant contain the names of the members who were here at the roll-call and who left before the doors were closed?

The SPEAKER. It contained the name of every member who did not vote at the time the call of the House was ordered except such as had permission of the House to be absent.

Mr. CONGER. But there were some who answered to the first roll-call and went out before the doors were ordered to be closed. Those I suppose could not be reached by this warrant.

Mr. VALENTINE. There were quite a number of them.

Mr. CONGER. The warrant, then, does not contain the names of those who were here at the roll-call, but who left before the doors were closed.

The SPEAKER. The names of the absentees on the call of the House were taken and given to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Some members answered to the roll-call and then left before the doors were closed.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman indicate such members?

Mr. WILBER. Quite a number of names of members were taken by the young man at the door who have not returned since they went out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read an extract from the Manual on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon calls of the House, the names of the members shall be called over (alphabetically—Rule 35) by the Clerk, and the absentees noted. After which the names of the absentees shall again be called over. The doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody wherever to be found, by special messengers, to be appointed for that purpose.—Rule 36, page 107.

[The order of arrest is not usually made by the House unless a quorum cannot otherwise be obtained; and, upon the appearance of a quorum, a motion is usually made and carried that "all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with;" and this motion is held to be in order at any period of the proceedings. The order for arrest is usually in this form, namely: "That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House;" and, upon its adoption, a warrant, under the hand and seal of the Speaker, and attested by the Clerk, with a list of the absentees thereto attached, is immediately placed in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Upon his appearance with members under arrest, he is announced at the bar of the House by the Doorkeeper, whereupon he makes his return. The members brought in by him are then severally arraigned by the Speaker, and interrogated by him as to what excuses they may have to offer for being absent from the sitting of the House without its leave.—Barclay.]

Mr. WILBER. There is a quorum present, and we have had a quorum all the time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Under that rule the call of the House is unnecessary, and I therefore move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That was the last motion submitted.

Mr. ROBINSON, (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m., Saturday.) I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 70.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 60.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. I submitted to the House five hours ago a proposition.

Several MEMBERS. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BELFORD. I do not propose to debate. I desire to make a proposition.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to make a proposition.

Mr. BELFORD. I submitted five hours ago a proposition to the House to the effect that the bill with the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas shall be printed in the RECORD, that the previous question shall then apply, and that the House adjourn. [Loud cries of "Object!"] Does the Chair say I cannot submit that as a motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair says the gentleman cannot.

Mr. BELFORD. Then I submit to the authority of the Chair.

Mr. BARBER, (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes a. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 41, noes 62.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that no member make another move.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS,] that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WEAVER. The center wants to make a proposition. I propose we take a vote right now on the Ryan amendment.

Several members objected.

Mr. REAGAN. If that will satisfy the gentlemen on the other side of the House, I think we ought to do that.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, and others objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman that the only way he can get a vote on the amendment to which he alludes is by voting down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Or by having it withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. If it is withdrawn that is of same effect.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair might have stated that other way.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] if he will not consent now to take a vote at this time on the Ryan amendment? You have twenty or thirty majority at this time in the House. If that is done, as I understand, it will be agreed on this side that after voting on the Ryan amendment the previous question shall apply to the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly; that is the proposition, that the previous question shall apply to the bill immediately after that vote. Is not that fair?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I object.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to ask the Chair a question. Is it possible to agree to anything?

The SPEAKER. It does not so appear.

Mr. WHITE. Would it be in order to submit a motion that we adjourn for breakfast?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain a motion to adjourn qualified in that way.

Mr. WHITE. Well, I will put it in another way. Can I move that we take a recess for breakfast?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. That is out of order.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I would like to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Will there be any RECORD printed before this day's proceedings end?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read a note just received from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1879.

SIR: In accordance with your verbal request I hand you herewith a list of members of the House reported as sick and on that account refused to obey the order of the House to attend its session:

J. H. ACKLEN, WILLIAM GODSHALK, D. C. HASKELL, G. F. ROTHWELL, J. C. SHERWIN, R. L. VANCE, W. C. WHITTHORNE, F. WOOD, H. D. MONEY, R. L. GIBSON, E. B. FINLEY, O. R. SINGLETON.

The following members, from the best information obtainable, are reported not in the city:

J. H. KETCHAM, DANIEL O'REILLY, E. OVERTON, JR., MILES ROSS, B. BUTTERWORTH, N. W. ALDRICH, J. JORGENSEN, J. H. STARIN, J. R. TUCKER, E. L. MARTIN, S. B. DICK, R. P. BLAND, W. D. HILL.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN G. THOMPSON,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

HON. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker House of Representatives, United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring to the bar of the House all who are not sick or out of the city.

Mr. SPARKS. I understand the gentlemen whose names are last mentioned on the Sergeant-at-Arms's list are those who are absent on leave.

The SPEAKER. They are those who are reported not to be in the city.

Mr. SPARKS. As I understand, absent on leave.

The SPEAKER. Absent without leave; otherwise their names would not be on the list of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. SCALES. I observe the name of my colleague, Mr. VANCE, is reported. He obtained leave of the House to be absent on account of indisposition, and should not have been interfered with.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BLAND, as the Chair understands, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. LOWE. So is Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. ROTHWELL, has been confined by very serious indisposition for the last four days at the Metropolitan Hotel. It is impossible for him to be brought here.

The SPEAKER. In some cases the time for which leave of absence has been granted has expired.

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to state in this connection that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BUTTERWORTH, on leaving the city desired me to ask leave for him on the next day. I neglected to do so, which I regret extremely. I promised him when Congress met on the next day to get the ordinary leave granted to every member on application. It is due to him to make this statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BUTTERWORTH, got leave, the Chair is advised, and the time has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. Quite a number of the gentlemen who are reported sick were here to-night and went home. I do not think the Sergeant-at-Arms has done his duty in not bringing them to the bar.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DICK, had leave of absence for a week.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. TUCKER, is not absent on leave, I desire to ask that leave of absence be granted to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is now informed that that gentleman has leave of absence.

Mr. SCALES. I understood that the Sergeant-at-Arms was only to report the gentlemen who were absent without leave. Now I know my colleague, Mr. VANCE, is absent on leave given him to-night.

Mr. SPARKS. I think great trouble has grown out of the fact that after the call of the House a great many gentlemen immediately left the Hall and are not here. A great many gentlemen who answered on the last call have gone and a new call of the House would bring them back. I move, then, that there be a new call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must first move to dispense with the old call before entering on a new one.

Mr. SPARKS. I move, then, to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. That motion has just been voted on, and the only motion now in order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. My motion is to dispense with the present call with the view of moving a new call of the House.

The SPEAKER. But that motion has just been voted down and the Chair cannot entertain it.

Mr. KENNA. Has not the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms been sufficient business intervening for the motion of the gentleman to be in order?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon sustaining the demand for the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move that the House take a recess until nine o'clock.

Mr. MCKENZIE. We are not going to take a recess at all.

Mr. SPARKS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. If there were a quorum present a motion for a recess would be in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m., Saturday.) I move that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 52, noes 70.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I now insist on my motion for a call of the House.

Mr. CONGER. There was a quorum present on the last count.

The SPEAKER. There was not, but the Chair did not raise that point himself; though less than a quorum could not take a recess. The question was decided in the negative, and therefore the Chair did not present the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Then I think we had better have one more vote on adjourning.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I desire to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. Pending the motion for a call of the House, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point that the gentleman cannot take the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] from the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make the motion to adjourn, the motion to dispense with proceedings under the call having intervened.

The question was taken on Mr. CONGER's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 67.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The last vote shows large gains.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only ten members voting therefor.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I now insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and it was ordered that there be a call of the House.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask that the doors be closed and the Sergeant-at-Arms be sent for the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The doors will be closed by order of the Speaker at the proper time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Before we proceed further, I move that all who are sick and indisposed have leave of absence. [Loud cries of "Object!"]

The roll was then called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Acklen,	Dunn,	Kitchin,	Prescott,
Aldrich, N. W.	Einstein,	Knott,	Price,
Aldrich, William	Elam,	Lapham,	Ross,
Atherton,	Ellis,	Lay,	Rothwell,

Bland,	Hammond, N. J.	McCook,	Smith, A. Herr
Bragg,	Harmer,	McGowan,	Starin,
Brewer,	Harris, John T.	McLane,	Stephens,
Browne,	Haskell,	Miles,	Talbott,
Buckner,	Hawk,	Miller,	Tucker,
Butterworth,	Hayes,	Mitchell,	Turner, Thomas
Calkins,	Hazelton,	Money,	Vance,
Camp,	Henderson,	Morse,	Voorhis,
Chalmers,	Hill,	Neal,	Washburn,
Chittenden,	Hubbell,	Newberry,	Wells,
Clark, Alvah A.	Hull,	Nicholls,	Whiteaker,
Clymer,	James,	O'Brien,	Whitthorne,
Cobb,	Jorgensen,	O'Reilly,	Willis,
Colerick,	Keifer,	Orth,	Wood, Fernando
Cowgill,	Kelley,	Overton,	Wood, Walter A.
Cox,	Ketcham,	Phelps,	Wright,
Crowley,	Killinger,	Pierce,	Young, Casey.
Dickey,	Kimmel,	Pound,

The SPEAKER. The doors will now be closed.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

Mr. FRYE. It is within my knowledge that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GODSHALK,] an old gentleman, who has been in a very feeble state of health this whole session, has gone home sick to-night, and I ask that he be excused, for he ought not to be brought here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can corroborate that statement.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and Mr. GODSHALK was excused.

Mr. FROST. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. ROTHWELL, is seriously ill. I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I desire to state that my colleagues, Mr. COBB and Mr. COLERICK, are absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] which has been read.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to amend the resolution by adding thereto the words "and this order shall be in force during the adjournment of the House." I make this motion to amend with a view, if it is adopted, to move an adjournment until twelve o'clock, Saturday.

Mr. SPARKS. Is it in order to move to adjourn pending a call of the House?

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNA. Would not an adjournment terminate the call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It would. An adjournment vacates all proceedings under a call of the House.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE. I object.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask that it be read for information.

Mr. McKENZIE. I object.

Mr. BELFORD. One or two resolutions have been read for information to-night. I ask that this be read for information; I think it will suit the views of the gentleman.

Mr. HURD. I object to any resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that my resolution be acted on.

The question was taken upon the resolution of Mr. REAGAN, and it was adopted.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to inquire what became of my amendment? I moved to amend the resolution so as to continue the order in force after an adjournment of to-day's session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can now make a motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to report the absentees to the House—when?

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to arrest the absentees and bring them to the bar of the House at twelve o'clock Saturday.

Mr. KENNA. If that motion is amendable, I move to strike out "twelve o'clock Saturday" and to insert "forthwith."

Mr. BLACKBURN. We can vote down the motion.

Mr. HURD. I want to be understood as objecting to everything. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to know if it is competent for this House to agree to vote on the Ryan amendment at one o'clock Saturday, and to take the vote on the final passage of the bill at two o'clock? If it is, then I desire to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] has moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to report the absentees to the House at twelve o'clock to-morrow, that is, Saturday.

Mr. MURCH. I move to amend that so as to make it Monday at ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is having looked up a case in point.

Mr. GARFIELD. Such an order as that has been repeatedly made within my recollection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it was made in one case.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it in order to move to lay the proposition and the amendment on the table?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move as an amendment that a warrant issue to the Sergeant-at-Arms to be made returnable on Monday.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it in order to move to lay the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] on the table?

Mr. CONVERSE. At the request of my friend I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. MURCH. I renew it, with the modification that the absentees be reported to the bar of the House at twelve o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. The House having made an order for the call of the House, is any other motion now in order?

The SPEAKER. The call of the House is being proceeded with. The Chair has just signed the warrant and placed it in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. MURCH. Is my motion entertained?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will determine in a moment, as soon as the precedents can be looked up. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to bring to the bar of the House on Monday next at twelve o'clock all absentees without excuse.

Mr. KENNA. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The same result can be reached by voting down the motion.

Mr. KENNA. Very well.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. MURCH; and upon a division there were—ayes 65, noes 71.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 76, not voting 136; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. MURCH was disagreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. POEHLER. I am paired with Mr. POUND, of Wisconsin.

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. HURD. I am paired with Mr. LEWIS. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. COVERT. I am paired with Mr. DUNN, of Arkansas.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CAMP. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. NEWBERRY, of Michigan. If he were, I should vote "no."

Mr. HOSTETLER. Mr. COLERICK and Mr. COBB are absent by leave of the House.

Mr. SIMONTON. Mr. CLYMER is paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN, of New York.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. WASHBURN, of Minnesota. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with Mr. MILES, of Connecticut.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am paired with Mr. WHITTHORNE.

Mr. WEAVER. I am paired with Mr. REED.

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey, on all political questions except the silver bill.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. ELAM, of Louisiana. My colleague, Mr. NORCROSS, is paired with Mr. STEELE, of North Carolina.

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi.

Mr. EWING. Mr. COX is paired with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, Mr. HAMMOND, of New York.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HAMMOND, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York. I went to dinner at six o'clock and was informed the House had adjourned. That is my only excuse.

Mr. MCMAHON. I move that the gentleman be excused without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HURD. I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

Mr. HURD proceeded to address the House notwithstanding calls to order and the rappings of the Speaker; but his remarks were inaudible at the reporters' desk.

Mr. SPARKS. I object to everything out of order.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, I have received a note from my colleague [Mr. FELTON] stating that the illness of his little son has prevented him from attending the sitting of the House.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, in pursuance of its order, having in custody Mr. NEWBERRY and Mr. MCGOWAN.

The SPEAKER. Mr. NEWBERRY, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. Speaker, I submitted myself last evening to the guidance of an older member of the House, and supposing the House would adjourn, I asked him if he was ready for his dinner, and he said he was, and we paired and left the House.

Mr. MILLS. Another victim of misplaced confidence.

Mr. VALENTINE. I move the gentleman be excused without the payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MCGOWAN, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MCGOWAN. I left the House last evening about half past five o'clock during the roll-call on a motion to adjourn. My residence is a good way from the House, a mile and a half, and I was not aware the House was in session but supposed it had adjourned.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is this your first offense?

Mr. MCGOWAN. It is.

Mr. SPARKS. Were you paired?

Mr. MCGOWAN. No.

Mr. BLISS. I move the gentleman be excused without the payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. I move the House adjourn, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 84, not voting 130; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. COVERT. I am paired with Mr. DUNN, of Arkansas.

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with Mr. COWGILL, of Indiana. Mr. ATHERTON, of Ohio, is paired with Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. WASHBURN. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. KING. I am paired with Mr. EINSTEIN, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. HOSTETLER. My colleagues, Mr. COLERICK and Mr. COBB, are absent by leave of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. SIMONTON. Mr. CLYMER, of Pennsylvania, is paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New York.

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi.

Mr. WEAVER. I am paired with Mr. REED, of Maine. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. BRIGGS. I am paired with Mr. WHITTHORNE. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. PRESCOTT, of New York, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. RICHMOND, of Virginia. If he were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. RICE. I am paired with Mr. ELAM, of Louisiana, and Mr. NORCROSS is paired with Mr. STEELE, of North Carolina.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. BREWER is paired with Mr. TALBOTT, of Maryland.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. KEIFER, is paired with Mr. ROTHWELL, of Missouri. If present, my colleague would vote "ay."

Mr. VAN AERNAM. My colleague, Mr. LAPHAM, is paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with Mr. PRESCOTT. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. EWING. Mr. COX, of New York, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HURD. I am paired with Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having, pursuant to the order of the House, in his custody Mr. BEALE, of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BEALE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. Have you any excuse to offer?

Mr. BEALE. Mr. Speaker, in conformity, I presume, to the usual habit of many members of the House, at nearly five o'clock last evening I left this body for the purpose of getting my dinner. Learning some three hours afterward, perhaps—I do not remember the exact time—that the House was still in session, I repaired at once to the Capitol to find that the doors were closed and that a call of the House had been ordered. But, Mr. Speaker, could I have been of any service in this body upon this great question which is pending before it I would have been the last man to have deserted my friends on my left, or to have turned my back upon my friends on my right, but I was of no consequence whatever in this House, because upon this bill I was paired with my colleague from Virginia, [Mr. JORGENSEN,] and even upon a question of adjournment in a contest like this I could not vote. I regret extremely that I have been absent and violated the rule which I acknowledge required that I should be here, and I sympathize most deeply with those who have remained here all night.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. BEALE. I thank you, sir; that is all I ask.

The question was taken on Mr. WHITE's motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if it is true that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has an hour to explain the silver bill in at the close of the proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to one hour as the reporter of the bill from the committee.

Mr. WHITE. Would it be in order for me to move that he proceed at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is at the option of the gentleman from Ohio to determine whether he will proceed to occupy the hour before or after the main question has been ordered.

Mr. WHITE. I will submit, then, through the Chair, to the gentleman from Ohio the request that he proceed at this time to close the debate on the silver bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is a way in which the gentleman's object can be obtained, and that is by seconding the previous question.

Mr. WHITE. I asked the question of the gentleman from Ohio and not of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this would be a good time to second the previous question. We have been here eighteen hours in continuous session.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] reply to the inquiry which I have propounded to him through the Chair?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentlemen opposite have manifested to the country their opposition to the bill and they should now allow us to sustain the previous question and we will pass the bill in fifteen minutes.

Mr. WHITE. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is not prepared to close the debate some gentlemen upon this side of the House desire to give the reasons why they are opposed to sustaining the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. I for one will proceed at this time to do so if permitted. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will observe that the Chair has stated debate is not in order, objection being made.

Mr. WHITE. I did not hear the objection. I thought I was proceeding by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is now informed that objection is made.

Mr. WHITE. I was about criticising the revolutionary proceedings on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman now hears the objection.

Mr. WHITE. I submit to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BARBER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to be informed what is the precise question now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the order for a call of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is executing the order of the House to bring in absent members.

Mr. BARBER. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, has left his seat. I would like to have the Sergeant-at-Arms sent after him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman left with the permission of the Chair.

Mr. FRYE. I beg pardon.

Mr. HURD. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I desire to show that the honest dollar has friends on this side.

Objection was made.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms then appeared and announced that, pursuant to the order of the House, he had at the bar of the House Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HAZELTON, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HAZELTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to be here at the bar under these circumstances, [laughter;] but I came as soon as I was notified that I ought to be here. I cannot prevaricate about this at all. I thought my presence was of no great account.

Mr. BURROWS. That is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAZELTON. And not feeling well I went out for a couple of hours.

Mr. URNER. I move that the gentleman from Wisconsin be excused and that he be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HURD. I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HURD. It was said when I made the statement some time ago that there were twenty hard-money democrats in this House——

Mr. WISE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the gentleman is speaking within the scope of a personal explanation; and objection is made on the right of the Chair.

Mr. WHITE. I desire the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who has charge of this bill. I want to know if an amendment providing for the payment of all employés of the Government, including members of Congress, in ten-dollar refunding certificates would be accepted to this bill?

Mr. WARNER. The previous question will——

Mr. WHITE. Will not the gentleman accept that suggestion?

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection to the gentleman receiving certificates or anything else he wishes for his pay.

Mr. CONGER. Then if the gentleman consents, I hope we will have a vote upon the proposition.

Mr. WARNER. There is a question already pending whenever that side is ready to vote.

Mr. WHITE. I am requested to ask the Chair whether the eight-hour law applies to members of Congress?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the question propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr WHITE] requires any response at all from the Chair.

Mr. WHITE. Well, I am satisfied. I will say that I am in favor of that law.

Mr. COOK. If a man can support himself by working one hour a day I am in favor of his doing so; if it requires eight hours a day, let him work that long.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that the democratic party is opposed to the eight-hour law.

Mr. COOK. The democratic party is opposed to a man laboring one hour a day if he can get along without it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. COOK. Oh, no; that will not do.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. DUNNELL; and upon a division there were—ayes 45, noes 63.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not require a quorum to decide this question.

Mr. CONGER. That is my opinion also.

The motion of Mr. DUNNELL was not agreed to.

Mr. MORTON, (at six o'clock and twenty-five minutes a. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to take into custody and bring before the bar of the House such members as have departed without the leave of the House since the last call of the roll was made.

Mr. BARBER. Who are they?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that it has been an invariable practice for members to leave the Hall after the doors have been closed by order of the House; but a list has been kept of those leaving the House, and they are checked off as they return. Does the gentleman desire that such members be brought back?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I desire only to have taken into custody and brought before the House those members who, after the call had begun and after they had responded to their names, departed from the House without leave.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In what form does the gentleman submit his motion?

Mr. SPRINGER. That those members who have departed from the House without the leave of the House since the order for a call——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How is the Sergeant-at-Arms to ascertain who they are?

Mr. SPRINGER. If he finds any member outside of the House, let him bring him in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not within the province of the Chair to pass upon the feasibility of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. CONGER. There is no law under which a man can be arrested without proper process.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is entirely competent for the House to compel the attendance of its absent members.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. My point of order is that pending the call of the House no business is in order except a motion to adjourn or to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule provides that no motion, except to adjourn or in reference to the call of the House, is in order or shall be entertained during a call of the House.

Mr. CONGER. The motion of the gentleman relates to such members, and such only, as are not affected by the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order and holds that the motion relates to proceedings under the call.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. May I ask the Chair a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What sort of warrant will go to the Sergeant-at-Arms to make these new arrests?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in the province of the Chair to answer that question.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER; and upon a division there were—ayes 26, noes 46.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER said: I call for the yeas and nays. I desire to see who will vote for this proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being twenty in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Will the Chair state what is the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER, has moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring before the bar of the House such members as have left the House since the last call of the House was ordered.

Mr. WHITE. Left the building or left the Hall?

Mr. MILLS. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 47, nays 81, not voting 157; as follows:

So Mr. SPRINGER'S motion was disagreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. STARIN.

Mr. KING. I am paired with Mr. EINSTEIN.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. WASHBURN. If he were here, I would vote "no."

Mr. COVERT. I am paired with Mr. DUNN, of Arkansas. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. BEALE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. JORGENSEN.

Mr. HERNDON. I am paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island.

On motion of Mr. COVERT, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The deputy sergeant-at arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in pursuance of the order, Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. FINLEY, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. FINLEY. As I told the Sergeant-at-Arms last night, I was sick and unable to come.

Mr. BLISS. I move the gentleman be excused without cost.

The motion was agreed to.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in pursuance of its order, Mr. MCCOOK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MCCOOK, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MCCOOK. Mr. Speaker, I remained here yesterday from twelve until six o'clock in the evening, two hours after the usual time for the adjournment of the House.

For over two weeks I have sat here listening to what I think are wild propositions, many of which have been incorporated into this bill, and I have not attempted to vex the ear of the House by expressing my views in regard to them, but have contented myself with voting against them. I could see no necessity for sitting up all night engaged either to obstruct legislation or help the passage of this bill, I did not do it; I went home and to bed. I may be technically in contempt of the House, but such is not my desire.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move the gentleman be fined $5. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCOOK. Very well, I will pay it with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. COFFROTH. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that the gentleman from New York be discharged without payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have been here all night, and I now ask to be excused from attendance until twelve o'clock to-day. I have an important engagement at eight o'clock with some gentlemen who have come over from New York to see me. It will be a great disappointment to them as well as myself if I am not permitted to keep the engagement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to excusing the gentleman from Colorado till twelve o'clock to-day?

Objection was made.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. I make this application in good faith.

Mr. BARBER. I trust the gentleman's request will be granted. I was assured by him some days ago that he had this engagement.

Mr. MILLS. How can we get along without him?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado? The Chair hears none. The request is granted.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar, having in custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. HAYES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HAYES, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, what I have to say is not so much in the way of excuse as in the way of a reason for my being absent. I think that since my connection with this honorable body I have been faithful in the discharge of my duties, have always been here at night as well as day sessions. Yesterday I staid here until six o'clock; and at that hour, anticipating a night session and in order to fortify myself for the duties that might devolve upon me during the night, I paired with the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES,] and we went home to dinner. I hurried to my dinner, ate it as rapidly as I could well do, and hurried back, being gone from the House only an hour and a quarter. When I came back I found that my rights as a member of this body had been invaded; the door was closed against me; and being desirous always of participating in the deliberations of this body, especially during the night sessions, when the body always conducts itself in a remarkably becoming, dignified, and august manner, I felt very much outraged by having the door closed against me. I was anxious at that time to be arrested and brought to the bar of the House. I stood around by the door, hoping that the Sergeant-at-Arms would see and arrest me. I even went into his room hoping that he would observe me there, arrest me, and bring me to the bar of the House. Finding that he did not do that, I paraded myself at various points in the gallery hoping that certain individuals would discover me and point me out to the Sergeant-at-Arms. Nothing of that kind, however, was done. Becoming weary, and feeling that my rights had been invaded, I went home at about half past nine o'clock and went to bed, went to sleep, and remained there until I was called up about six o'clock this morning by the Sergeant-at-Arms, when I told him I would come up here and report, as I have done. Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that my rights have been thus invaded, the door closed against me, and that I have not been permitted to participate in the deliberations of this august body, I will say that if the House will offer a sufficient apology to me I on my part will agree to forgive and endeavor to forget, promising hereafter to be punctual in the discharge of my duties.

Mr. SCALES. I move that the gentleman be discharged from custody without the payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, I have been here all night. I have some matters which I wish to attend to this morning. I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. SINGLETON, who is not here, and of course I cannot vote on any questions that come before the House. I would like, therefore, to be excused for the rest of the morning.

Mr. HAZELTON. I will ask the gentleman whether he was not brought here under arrest?

Mr. WAIT. No, sir; I came here voluntarily. [Laughter.] I understood the Sergeant-at-Arms was looking around for members, so I came up here voluntarily; he did not bring me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] asks to be excused from attendance on the session of the House until twelve o'clock to-day. The Chair hears no objection, and the request is granted.

Mr. BARBER. I move that the House resolve itself into a posse comitatus to go with the Sergeant-at-Arms in search of absent members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not in order.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask to be excused for one hour and a half to get breakfast.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON?]

Objection was made.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I ask to be excused for one hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object, unless others of us are allowed an opportunity for breakfast.

Mr. VALENTINE. If in order I will move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to report the absent members at the bar of this House on Monday at twelve o'clock.

The question being taken on Mr. VALENTINE's motion there were—ayes 46, noes 58.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House having in his custody, pursuant to the order of the House, Mr. CHITTENDEN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. CHITTENDEN, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am honestly paired with Mr. CLYMER, of Pennsylvania. Is that excuse sufficient? If that is not enough I will, if in order, rise to a question of personal privilege. I should like to settle one or two personal matters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order for the gentleman from New York to give his excuse to the House for his absence.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have given my excuse. I was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the gentleman from New York be discharged from custody without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if it would be in order to move, and if it be I make the motion, that all members present who desire to absent themselves for a period of two hours can do so on entering their names with the Doorkeeper.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order on that motion. I understand no motion of that sort to be in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is well taken. Under the rulings of the Chair, but two motions are in order during the proceedings under a call of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Permit me to say there is nothing in the way of this being done by unanimous consent. That can do anything, I understand, but hang a man. Why should we not go and get a good breakfast and return here at ten o'clock?

Several members objected.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask if agreeing to the request made by the gentleman from Connecticut would in any way suspend the proceedings in connection with the call of the House?

Mr. HAWLEY. Not at all.

Mr. ATKINS. I think not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. McKENZIE. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this would be a good time to put the bill on its passage. Immediately after taking a vote on the passage of the bill we could adjourn over until Monday next. I think that is a proposition so fair that every gentleman should accept it. I am willing that we should adjourn over even until Tuesday to accommodate gentlemen if they will agree that a vote be taken on the passage of the bill. I hear no objection to that proposition. I suppose it is agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. What is the proposition?

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill shall now be put upon its passage and that we adjourn over till Tuesday next.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. WHITE. There is this objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, that the amendment last offered by the gentleman having the bill in charge destroys the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSH,] because it takes from the Government the benefit of the difference between the par and the market value of the silver dollar.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will submit the proposition in this way: I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with; that the bill be then immediately put upon its passage; and thereafter that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas be also put upon its passage as a separate bill; and after these two propositions have been voted on let the House adjourn till Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; I object.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The House seems to be at a loss for employment, and I have one or two personal matters of some little importance that I want to settle at some time in the House, and I ask unanimous consent to rise now to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. WARNER. I object. The gentleman comes here too late to be entitled to ask any privileges of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I would submit this suggestion to the acceptance of the House, and it will certainly do no harm to submit it: One of the grounds on which objection has been made to proceeding with the vote on this bill was the exclusion of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] from consideration. Now, I suggest that by common consent we agree that that amendment be admitted as a substitute for the bill, that the previous question be called on the bill and that amendment, and that we then proceed to dispose of the subject in that way.

Mr. ATKINS. At once?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. When does the gentleman propose that the House shall vote?

Mr. REAGAN. Now.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; we do not propose to vote now.

Mr. REAGAN. Suppose we say that the vote shall be at one o'clock to-day.

Several MEMBERS. We will accept that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen in front of the Chair will resume their seats. The House will come to order.

Mr. REAGAN. I will restate the proposition. It is that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas be received as pending, that the previous question be called upon the bill and the amendment, and that the vote be taken to-day at one o'clock, without any dilatory motions.

Mr. CONGER. Say two o'clock.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Let it be two o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE. I object unless the vote be taken now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What hour does the gentleman from Texas designate?

Mr. REAGAN. I have suggested one o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. Some gentlemen will be here by the half past one o'clock train to vote. Let the proposition make the hour two o'clock. We have worked for that all night.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I hope that suggestion will be accepted on both sides.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires that the House may now understand the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as distinctly as possible. The Chair understands the proposition as submitted by the gentleman from Texas to be that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] shall be admitted and pending, and that the previous question shall now be considered as ordered on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas and on the bill, and that at the hour of two o'clock to-day without the interposition of any dilatory motions the vote shall be had upon the amendment and the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that in the mean time the bill be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There will not be time to print the bill.

Mr. MANNING. Does that proposition require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It certainly does.

Mr. MANNING. Then I must object. I cannot understand why we have been sitting here all night to agree to this proposition which we declined yesterday.

Mr. ANDERSON. I trust that objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. The proposition is certainly satisfactory to us.

Mr. PHISTER. Is the proposition that the vote shall be taken at two o'clock with the agreement that there shall be a vote upon the other side of the House? [Loud cries of "Oh, certainly!" from the republican side of the House.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would answer that the understanding is that at two o'clock the vote shall be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] and the bill in good faith and without debate.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to inquire whether the bill or the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas will be open to amendment after the seconding of the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Illinois that they will not be.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I object.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, by order of the House, Mr. NEAL, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. NEAL, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, last night at five o'clock I left the House to get my dinner. They were then voting on a motion to adjourn. I supposed they would adjourn. I found out during the evening that they had not adjourned. I came up here and could not get into the House anywhere, and then I took my seat in the gallery and was a very interested spectator of what was going on. After a reasonable time I went to my room, and the Sergeant-at-Arms came this morning and I dressed myself and came here, and here I am.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the gentleman be discharged without costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to make a suggestion with a view of fixing the hour of two o'clock so as to carry out the object of the motion made by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. I make that motion in order that the majority of the House may fix that hour for the vote to be taken upon the amendment and the bill as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, whether objection be made or not. I understand it is competent for the majority of the House to fix that hour for carrying into effect the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, if the proceedings under the call are suspended, and I ask that my motion be sustained by a majority of the members present with a view to action on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ATKINS. Before that is done is it understood that there are to be no dilatory motions? [Cries of "Oh, yes; certainly," from the republican side of the House.]

The question was taken on Mr. BAYNE's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 79, noes 31.

Mr. MANNING. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARNER. I hope that if this is to be done it will be done by unanimous consent. I think that if done at all it ought to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPARKS. So do I.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think the majority ought to have something to say about the proceedings of this House.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and only 21 members voted therefor—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. MILLS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not necessary to have a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and further proceedings under the call were dispensed with; and the Doorkeeper was ordered to open the doors of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I had intended to submit the motion which I have indicated to the House, and I now move that the previous question be called upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] and upon the bill, and that the vote upon the amendment and the bill be taken at half past one o'clock to-day without debate or dilatory motion.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Say at two o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE. I object.

Mr. MILLS. If this proposition is to be adopted, why were we kept here all night?

Mr. REAGAN. There has been no time when there was an agreement to stop filibustering. But now, when gentlemen on the other side are willing to stop filibustering, some of our friends here think the offer should be accepted.

Mr. MANNING. That statement is entirely gratuitous on the part of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN;] it is not warranted by the facts of the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to understand the condition of the question before the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word in response to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] for the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended. The motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is not in order, and will not be in order so long as the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is pending before the House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will accept the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. The same proposition now made was made yesterday evening by our friends on the other side. After having sat here all night long it is proposed that we shall simply agree to their proposition; that is an unconditional surrender, and that is all there is about it.

Mr. GARFIELD and others. Oh, no.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending motion is not debatable.

Mr. REAGAN. I say that there was no time when an agreement was proposed which included stopping filibustering.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman is very much in error, I think, as to that. I learn from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] that he was at all times willing——

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Kansas can speak only for himself.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FINLEY. If the pending motion for a previous question is now voted down, will the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] then be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is within the power of the House, by voting down the previous question or by refusing to second the demand for the previous question made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] to accept the motion made by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] But until the motion now pending before the House shall be disposed of by a vote of the House or by a withdrawal of the motion, the proposition of the gentleman from Texas will not be in order.

The question was then taken, upon the demand of Mr. WARNER for the previous question, upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 67, noes 4.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted. If we are to start in again let us start in strong. The gentleman from Texas himself, [Mr. REAGAN,] who has pretended to submit to us a fair proposition, has voted now to sustain the demand of the gentleman from Ohio for the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I would inquire of the Chair if the demand for the previous question is voted down, would the motion which I submitted be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be in order whenever by a withdrawal of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio now pending, or by its being voted down, that question shall have been disposed of. No quorum having voted on the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] the Chair will appoint Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. CONGER, of Michigan, to act as tellers.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to ask a question of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the previous question shall now be ordered, as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] will it be possible then to submit and have a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not be, without reconsidering the vote by which the previous question shall have been seconded.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is what I thought.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 54, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I can submit a proposition that will meet the unanimous approbation of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. MILLS.) No quorum having voted upon the vote by tellers, but two motions are now in order—a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is evidently a quorum in the Hall, and we can therefore proceed with business to a certain extent. I submit this proposition: that we now vote down the demand for the previous question. [Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!" on the republican side.] Then the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] shall be permitted to move his proposition as a substitute for the whole bill and we will proceed to take a vote on it immediately. Then in the event that proposition shall be voted down we will proceed to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and then postpone the further consideration of the bill until two o'clock, when the vote shall be taken on the final passage of the bill without further debate.

Mr. CONGER. There is objection to voting on the Ryan amendment at this time. Let both propositions go over until two o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are a great many gentlemen who desire to vote on the final passage of the bill who are not now here; and there would be a much fuller House at two o'clock than there is now.

Mr. CONGER. That is the case with this side.

Mr. SPRINGER. Gentlemen on this side of the House will not consent to leave this matter open to a difference of opinion.

Mr. CONGER. Then let gentlemen on that side of the House go on. They have fooled us once; we do not want to be fooled by them again.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have not fooled you.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not doubt that whatever agreement may be made will be kept by both sides.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have submitted a fair proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not quite fair to propose to take a vote on a substitute for an important bill at this time, when at two o'clock we will have a much fuller House.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the mean time the bill can be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right. Now if the gentleman will take the course he suggests, only allowing the votes on the bill and the substitute to be taken at two o'clock, there will be no dilatory motions made then, but a prompt vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. The proposition I have offered is a fair one. I am sure that unless my proposition is accepted by gentlemen on the other side we can come to no agreement at all.

Many MEMBERS on the republican side. Very well.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think that if we intend to admit a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] we ought to vote on that amendment at the same time with the original bill. The same reason which is urged for deferring the vote on the original bill until two o'clock may be also urged for deferring the vote on the amendment until that time. I am in favor of giving both propositions a fair opportunity and a fair vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. CONGER. We agree to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. What the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] says is eminently fair, and we on this side are ready to agree to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the object of gentlemen on the other side is to put themselves on record upon the substitute of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] they are all here now and can now make the record.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are fifteen or twenty gentlemen on each side who are now away at their rooms.

Mr. SPRINGER. Those members who are absent from the House without its leave have no right to claim any privileges from the members who have been here all night.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. The amendment I have offered is in good faith.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not question the good faith of the gentleman.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I offered it, not for the purpose merely of making a record, but to have a fair vote on it, which I desire to have as much as the gentleman desires to have a fair vote on the original bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let both propositions have the same chance.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has made a proposition. I desire to submit one which I think will be agreeable to gentlemen on the other side, and which I think is a fair and just one for all. It is substantially the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that the demand for the previous question be either withdrawn or voted down; that then the amendment or substitute, whatever it may be called, of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] as printed in the RECORD of the 15th instant, be considered as pending to the bill as amended by the House; and that then the previous question shall be considered as operating upon the bill and the substitute, and that the vote upon the two propositions be taken, without debate and without dilatory motions——

Mr. GARFIELD. And without abstention from voting.

Mr. CONGER. Without abstention from voting, at two o'clock to-day.

Mr. WILSON. No other amendment to be offered.

Mr. CONGER. No other amendment to be offered; the votes to be solely on the Ryan substitute and on the bill.

Mr. WILSON. And no question raised as to the want of a quorum.

Mr. CONGER. There will be no abstaining from voting to break up a quorum.

Mr. WARNER. Why not take the vote now?

Mr. CONGER. I have submitted a proposition which we are all willing to agree to and which we have been willing to agree to at any time for the past twelve hours, only that heretofore we have asked that the bill and amendment be printed. Now, we will look for the amendment back in the RECORD of the 15th and not ask to have it and the bill printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER?]

Mr. MANNING. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest this additional exception: that the votes on both propositions be taken at two o'clock to-day, provided that the vote be first taken on the passage of the bill now pending; and when that is disposed of that the vote be taken then on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] as a separate proposition.

Mr. CONGER and others. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman who objected to the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] rise in his place, so that he may be known?

Mr. SPARKS. I understand that the objection has been urged here that a vote is refused upon the Ryan amendment. Now, so far as I am concerned, I have always insisted upon a vote being taken upon that proposition. We have now been here in session for nearly twenty-four hours. Let us by mutual consent agree that we will vote upon the Ryan amendment and then vote upon the bill; and let us do it now and end the matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no.

Mr. SPARKS. You are in as good condition as we are.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let both propositions be voted on at two o'clock.

Mr. SPARKS. You are in as good condition as we are. If the objection be urged that we have refused to vote on the Ryan amendment, let us remove that objection and have a vote on that proposition now, and a vote on the bill now, and end the matter at this time. Now let us end this matter. That proposition is fair to all. You gentlemen on the other side are in as good condition as we are on this side.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is a proposition acceptable to this side of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. It is obvious two o'clock will arrive in about five and a half hours from now, and I presume every gentleman in the House would like to get a square breakfast. If they would consent to the proposition made by the gentleman from Connecticut some little time ago to take a rest for two hours in order to get a good square breakfast and come back in good humor, we might stay the other three hours and a half until two o'clock and then take a vote. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take a recess for two hours, go home, and get breakfast.

Several MEMBERS. Say eleven o'clock.

Mr. ATKINS. Do not amend my proposition.

Mr. HAWLEY. Say half past eleven o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. What is the particular urgency after abstaining from eating and rest, after being up all night, to rush to a vote on this bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I am not proposing to rush to a vote. I am only proposing to go home and get breakfast.

Mr. WHITE. We will accept that.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will the Chair inform us whether there is any objection to the proposition I have made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is it?

Mr. ATKINS. Simply that we go home and get breakfast and come back in two hours.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask the gentleman to consider this. If we should take a rest for two hours, the time between that and two o'clock——

Mr. ATKINS. Nothing about two o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition?

Mr. HOUSE. It does seem to me when we are going to accept this proposition and come to an understanding there is no sense in stickling about two hours. If we are going to adjourn why not say three hours, and give us all an opportunity to take a nap and give everybody an opportunity who wishes to vote on this bill to come here to do it. It is fair to both sides, why stickle on either side?

Mr. GARFIELD. I learn on consultation there are about fifteen members on our side of the House who are not here this morning. It would be a wrong to them to have the vote taken until they can get here.

Mr. WARNER. Let the vote be taken now.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would not be fair to take a vote when those members are not here.

Mr. ATKINS. I would have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to the suggestion made by my colleague, but I am aware there are gentlemen on our side who have objected and who probably will object to that proposition; while I do not believe that any one will object to the proposition I have made.

Mr. GARFIELD. The only objection to that is it does not hasten the final settlement.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course it does not, but let us go home and get breakfast.

Mr. ROBESON. It is a fair proposition, and let us accept it for what it is worth.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the Chair ask unanimous consent, in accordance with my proposition, that we shall be allowed to go home and get breakfast.

Mr. HOUSE. Let my proposition be made first.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move the House take a recess.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing, retaining the floor, that the proposition of my colleague shall be put first, and I will assure him I will not object to it.

Mr. HOUSE. Which is, that we meet at two o'clock under the terms proposed to take the vote. [Cries of "All right!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE?]

Mr. REAGAN. I object to returning here to filibuster.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. No filibustering.

Mr. REAGAN. How are you going to get rid of filibustering?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move that we adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to be heard one moment on the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is pending.

Mr. CONGER. It is part of the agreement that at two o'clock there shall be no dilatory motions.

Mr. HAWLEY. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] himself was that the vote should be taken at two o'clock.

Mr. REAGAN. My proposition was not accepted by many on this side.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is accepted by everybody now except the gentleman from Texas himself, who rises to object. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas, repeated by the gentleman from Michigan, was that at two o'clock the previous question shall operate upon the Ryan amendment and upon the whole bill, and the two votes be taken without delay and without abstention from voting and without filibustering. Unanimous consent is now asked for that proposition, and the gentleman from Texas will be the only one that objects if objection is made.

Mr. SPARKS. I shall object to that. Why not go on and finish this bill now?

Mr. GARFIELD. Because there are a number of gentlemen on this side who will not be here to vote unless the vote be postponed until two o'clock.

Mr. ATKINS. I resume the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Chair to submit that question once more as a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ATKINS. It has turned out, just as I supposed it would, that the proposition which I have made is about the only proposition that can be agreed to; and now I hope that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] will not object to the proposition which I have made, that we take a recess for two hours, go home, get a good breakfast, and then come back and go on with this bill.

Mr. SPARKS. What will that amount to? If that proposition be agreed to, we will come back at the end of two hours and be in the same fuss then as we have been in all night.

Mr. ATKINS. We will have got our breakfast; that will be one advantage.

Mr. SPARKS. We have been in session nearly twenty-four hours. I think that it is time we shall finish this bill. Let us go on and end this matter, and then adjourn over till Tuesday. Why will not gentlemen agree to that proposition?

Mr. HAWLEY. Because we cannot agree to take the vote now. Let the gentleman from Illinois agree to the other proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the other proposition be submitted first, and if that should fail then let the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] be submitted.

Mr. ATKINS. It is very evident that some kind of proposition that has some sort of semblance of compromise in it has to be made in order that we may reach a vote at all on this subject. Now, the proposition I make is a very simple one. It amounts, it may be, to very little, and yet it is a step in the right direction; and if it is agreed to by the members of the House, I am sure that when we get back here we will come to a vote very soon on the pending measure.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that, but I would like that we should do more than that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS?]

Mr. KENNA. Oh, yes; there is objection to that.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the Chair again to submit the proposition formally to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] makes the proposition that the House take a recess for two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. McKENZIE and Mr. SPEER objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair submits the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House take a recess for two hours.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am quite sure I made no promise not to object to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee; but as that gentleman understands I gave a promise, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. KENNA. Is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order pending the demand for the previous question, when the House was dividing on the motion for the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not see that that alters the case. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] rose to make the motion which the Chair has submitted, and which the Chair holds to be in order, and the House is now dividing upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. WILSON. My inquiry is whether if the recess be taken for two hours, the bill at the close of the recess will occupy the same position as it does now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will occupy precisely the same position.

The question being taken on the motion that the House take a recess, there were ayes 93.

Before the negative vote was counted,

Mr. MANNING said: I desire to ask the Chair, who made this motion? I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] states that he did not make the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair accepted the motion for a recess for two hours from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. ATKINS. I have made no motion. I asked unanimous consent to the proposition which I made. I was about to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I had not made the motion when an interruption took place and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKENZIE] rose to withdraw the objection which he had made. The Chair was under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it was the gentleman from Tennessee who was under a misapprehension. The Chair asked if there was unanimous consent to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, and objection was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKENZIE,] the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER,] and others, whereupon the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] asked the Chair to submit his proposition to the House; and the Chair proceeded so to do.

Mr. ATKINS. What was that proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was no way to submit the proposition, objection having been made, except in the shape of a motion. The gentleman from Tennessee now asks to withdraw his motion.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask no such thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then those who desire to vote in the negative will rise.

Mr. ATKINS. Before that is done I hope the Chair will hear me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. I made no such motion. I asked that the Chair submit my proposition, which was a proposition for the unanimous consent of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Which had already been refused.

Mr. ATKINS. Very good. Then, Mr. Speaker, I said nothing further on this subject until I attempted to arrest the attention of the Chair to give the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKENZIE] an opportunity to rise in his place and withdraw his objection, which he had said he would do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is simply a misunderstanding on the part of the Chair, I beg to say, not of myself. Of course, I do not wish to make any insinuation at all that the Chair was not mindful of his duty, or anything of that kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair simply desires to say that it is not attributable to any misunderstanding on the part of the Chair, but an effort on the part of the Chair to accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee by submitting his proposition to the House, which had been objected to by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER,] as well as by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKENZIE,] when he asked unanimous consent.

Now the gentleman from Tennessee says that he did not intend that the Chair should submit it in the shape of a motion. The Chair knew then and knows now of no other method by which to accomplish the wish of the gentleman.

Mr. SCALES. I renew the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. I move that the House take a recess for two hours.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order, and it is that the motion is not in order pending a motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the point of order which the Chair has already passed upon, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The point of order is that the question was submitted to the House on the demand for the previous question; a quorum did not appear. Under these circumstances only two motions are in order, one is for a call of the House and the other is that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion for a recess has always been considered a question of privilege, equally so with a motion to adjourn. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question was taken on Mr. SCALES's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 84, noes 23.

Mr. McKENZIE. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it be possible at this point to raise the point of order which I wish to raise? It is this: that I had asked the Chair to allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKENZIE] to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair extended that privilege to the gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] announced that he objected to the request.

Mr. ATKINS. I did not hear it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the House do now adjourn; that will give us till twelve o'clock.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 85, noes 41.

Mr. McKENZIE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 69, not voting, 127; as follows:

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at five minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts. The SPEAKER. The doors will now be reopened; and the question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I call for a division on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 83, noes 2.

Mr. FRYE. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Maine, Mr. FRYE, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, no 1.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. FRYE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw my motion.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York desires to make a personal statement. How long does the gentleman ask?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Three or four minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN and Mr. WARNER objected.

Mr. WHITE. I think five minutes might be allowed to the gentleman on account of the personal respect that is entertained for him.

The objection was withdrawn.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the House, to the mothers, and to the young men of the country, in all sincerity, that in using a hard and vulgar word on the floor the other day, which I did not "revise" out of the RECORD—a word new to my own vocabulary, and most commonly proceeding out of the mouths of profane persons—I intended to qualify it so as to show that I used it strictly in an orthodox sense. I have been a member of the orthodox Congregational Church since I was sixteen years old; no one needs to be told that profanity is not tolerated in that church, though some of its ministers are fond of Shakspeare, and occasionally indiscreet enough to use carelessly the word which, I deeply regret to say, was forced out of my mouth a second time on Wednesday. The first time it was uttered all unconsciously. I say forced, because such is the truth. I was angry then, and in struggling for a strong word to express my just indignation without personal offense the one I used came violently forth. I am good-natured now, and confess, with becoming humility, that, physiologically, I am also thin-skinned, so to speak, and unable to bear with Christian patience the blows of the free silver-coinage and free-certificate inflationists. I am not a bondholder, if I understand what is meant by gentlemen who roll that word as a sweet morsel on their tongues so frequently and flippantly here; but I have to care for several widows and orphans, whose limited means I am frequently required to invest in Government bonds; and when I witness open declarations and persistent efforts on this floor pointing directly to the ultimate repudiation of such bonds, my thoughts involuntarily turn to such widows and orphans. Who will blame me?

A plague of all cowards, I say.
Lay on, Macduff!

Mr. ROBESON. I hope the gentleman will finish the quotation. [Laughter.] I object to the gentleman garbling Shakspeare. When he says "Lay on, Macduff," the gentleman by omitting to finish the sentence [laughter] declines to swear himself but leaves everybody else to swear by inference.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY,] in accordance with the notice given two days ago, asks unanimous consent to report at this time from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the bill known as the post-route bill. This bill is not usually read, the assurance being given by the gentleman in charge of it that it contains neither public nor private legislation other than the establishment of post-routes. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as read a first and second time, and the question will be on the engrossment and third reading. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. We understand that there is no legislation in the bill.

Mr. MONEY. None whatever.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that.

The bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MONEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES BARRACKS, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

Mr. NICHOLLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R

No. 2021) to vest the title of the United States barracks in the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, in the corporation of said city, for public uses; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. FORTH.

Mr. SPARKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2022) granting a pension to James M. Forth, of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the bill coming over from yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will see the propriety of having some arrangement as to the mode in which the House shall proceed to take action on it.

Mr. WARNER. What is the proposition of my colleague?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the suggestion which was made this morning was a very proper one.

Mr. WARNER. I will state to my colleague and to the House what I propose. I propose to include the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] under the operation of the previous question, with the understanding that a vote shall be taken upon that proposition separately, without debate and without dilatory motions——

Mr. GARFIELD. As a substitute for the bill?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir, as a substitute for the bill, and then that the House proceed to vote upon the bill without dilatory motions also, and with this further provision, in case I should desire to offer an amendment, a contingency I do not think at all likely to arise, but I wish to reserve the right that I should have that privilege also to offer an amendment to be voted on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand the proposition. Does the gentleman mean an amendment to the substitute in case of its adoption?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir; an amendment to the substitute in case of its adoption.

Mr. GARFIELD. I see no objection to the offering of the amendment, but I submit that in case of the adoption of the substitute the gentleman can offer it; but we upon this side of the House want to have the substitute of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] voted on just as it was offered.

Now I hope the Chair will state the proposition so that the whole House can understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] who is in charge of this bill temporarily, withdraws the demand for the previous question and allows the amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] and which was published in the RECORD of May 15, 1879, to be voted on. He will then renew his demand for the previous question. The understanding is that this amendment shall be voted upon without debate; and whether adopted or not without further dilatory motion to the conclusion of the final vote on the bill, with this exception: that in case the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] shall be adopted by the House unanimous consent is now given, notwithstanding the previous question may be ordered, that in such case the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] shall have an opportunity to offer and have voted upon an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Only one amendment.

Mr. WARNER. And it is further understood that in such an event no advantage is to be taken on the other side by the non-voting of members.

Mr. FRYE. All right; we agree to that.

Mr. MCMAHON. We want everything connected with this matter clearly understood.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MCMAHON. The proposition which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] desires to make is, that he may offer an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill which is offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN.]

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. That is all right.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have a further suggestion to make: we expect some members of the House to arrive in the city by the half-past-one-o'clock train, and I desire to ask that in case they do not get here before the last name on the roll is called they may not be cut off. I do not want to delay the matter in any way.

The SPEAKER. That might change the result.

Mr. SPARKS. Are not the gentlemen all paired?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know whether they are paired or not, but if these members should arrive and would come here straight from the depot we should like the roll-call delayed fifteen minutes so as to enable them to vote.

Mr. CONGER. I think that is only just to them. I do not anticipate that their votes would make any difference in the result, while I think they ought to have an opportunity of voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will take some time to have the vote read through, and it might be that they would arrive in time.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill will now be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have the original bill read first. We are to vote on striking out the entire bill and inserting a substitute. Let us have both read, first the original bill and then the substitute. There are a number of gentlemen who are quite uncertain as to the provisions of the original bill. I for one have never heard it read in its amended form.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it not an unreasonable request to have the bill read, since the motion is to strike out the original text of the bill and insert a substitute.

The Clerk read the original bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3511. The gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, or unit; a quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece; a three-dollar piece; a half eagle, or five-dollar piece; an eagle, or ten-dollar piece; and a double eagle, or twenty-dollar piece. And the standard weight of the gold dollar shall be 25.8 grains; of the quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece, 64½ grains; of the three-dollar piece, 77.4 grains; of the half eagle, or five-dollar piece, 129 grains; of the eagle, or ten-dollar piece, 258 grains; of the double eagle, or twenty-dollar piece 516 grains."

SEC. 2. That section 3513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3513. The silver coins of the United States shall be a dollar, or unit; a half dollar, or fifty-cent piece; a quarter dollar, or twenty-five-cent piece; a dime, or ten-cent piece. And the weight of the dollar shall be 412½ grains troy; the weight of the half dollar shall be twelve grams and one-half of a gram; the quarter dollar and the dime shall be respectively one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half dollar. And silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States, when reduced in weight by natural abrasion more than 1 per cent. below the standard weight prescribed by law, shall be recoined."

SEC. 3. That section 3520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3520. Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into bars or into standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, for his benefit, and no deposit of silver for other coinage shall be received; and silver bullion contained in gold deposits, and separated therefrom, may be paid for in silver coin: Provided, That it shall be lawful to refuse at the Mint any deposit of bullion of less value than $100 and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the Mint."

SEC. 4. That section 3524 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3524. The charges for converting gold and silver bullion into coin shall be the difference between the market value in New York city of the bullion and the legal-tender value of the coin. The charges for melting and refining when bullion is below standard, for toughening when metals are contained in it which render it unfit for coinage, for copper used for alloy when the bullion is above standard, for separating the gold and silver when these metals exist together in the bullion, and for the preparation of bars, shall be fixed from time to time by the Director, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to equal but not exceed, in their judgment, the actual average cost to each mint and assay office of the material, labor, wastage, and use of machinery employed in each of the cases aforementioned."

SEC. 5. That section 3527 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3527. Silver coins of less denominations than $1 shall be paid out at the several mints and at the assay office in New York city to the extent they may be required in exchange for gold coins or standard silver dollars or United States notes at par in sums not less than $50. It shall be lawful also to transmit parcels of the same from time to time to the assistant treasurers, depositaries, and other officers of the United States, for exchange under general regulations proposed by the Director of the Mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and silver coins of less denominations than $1, when presented at the Treasury or any subtreasury or depository of the United States in sums not less than $20, shall be received in exchange for money of full legal tender."

SEC. 6. That section 3585 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3585. The gold coins of the United States and standard silver dollars shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, and when reduced in weight below such standard and tolerance shall be a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed and required to cause to be paid out without discrimination standard silver coin belonging to the Government that may at any time be in the Treasury the same as gold coin in liquidation of all kinds of coin obligations against the Government."

SEC. 7. That section 3586 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3586. The silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $20 in any one payment."

SEC. 8. That section 254 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 254. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, or to receive bullion with the superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, or with the superintendents of the branch mint in Carson City and of the Government assay offices, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations at the discretion of the depositor, of not less than $5 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. And certificates representing coin in the Treasury, together with those issued for bullion deposited, shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports: Provided, That all certificates for gold or silver bullion shall be issued at the average market value of such bullion in standard coin of the same metal in New York and San Francisco for the week preceding such deposit: Provided further, That gold or silver bullion which shall become the property of the Government by the return of certificates to the Treasury, in payment of dues thereto, shall be coined and paid out the same as other money."

SEC. 9. That from and after the passage of this act, except as provided in section 8, only coins of less denominations than $1 shall be fabricated on Government account. But the Secretary shall cause to be coined, up to the full capacity of the mints, in connection with other coinage, the gold and silver bullion deposited for coinage under this act; and in converting bullion into bars or coin for depositors precedence shall be given in the order in which deposits are made; but this provision shall not prohibit the delivery of coin or stamped bars in exchange for bullion as soon as its value is ascertained: Provided, That in determining the average market value of bullion for the purpose of ascertaining the charge for converting the same into coin, as provided by section 3524 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the fourth section of this act, said market rate shall be the value of the bullion in coin of the same metal at its legal-tender value in the cities of New York and San Francisco for the week preceding such deposit: Provided, That in the event silver bullion is not deposited under the provisions of this act available for coinage to the amount of $2,000,000 per month, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue to purchase under the provisions of the law of February 28, 1878, sufficient silver bullion to coin $2,000,000 per month.

SEC. 10. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the coinage of silver except into the standard dollar.

SEC. 11. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. The amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] will now be read.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That there shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act, which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion, at the market price thereof, sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act, but the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of coin, shall not exceed $10,000,000.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to coin such silver bullion into such dollars as fast as the same can be done with the mintage capacity now existing or that may be hereafter provided, not however in any manner to interfere with the employment of such mints for the coinage of gold under existing laws—it being the intent and meaning of this act to employ the mints of the United States to their utmost capacity in the coinage of such silver dollars, subject to the necessary occupation of such mints for gold coinage as now provided for by law: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the payment in silver of certificates of deposit issued under the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 2. When the price of standard silver bullion shall equal the nominal value of the standard silver dollar the owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars, or into standard dollars, without charge therefor for his or her benefit, and the same shall be so formed into such bars or dollars in the order in which it shall be so deposited; but it shall be lawful to refuse at the mint any deposit of bullion of less value than $100 and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint.

SEC. 3. That any holder of the coin authorized by this act may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums not less than $10, and receive therefor certificates of not less than $10 each corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand; said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued.

SEC. 4. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the previous question been moved?

The SPEAKER. It is operating by unanimous consent.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the substitute, when

Mr. WARNER, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. SPRINGER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, fifty-six members voting therefor.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the substitute shall be adopted, then the question will recur on the passage of the amended bill.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but prior to that the amendment which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has the privilege of offering would be in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. The choice is now simply the choice between two forms, the original bill which has just been read and the substitute of the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 69, nays 137, not voting 79; as follows:

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote. I had forgotten for the moment that I am paired with Mr. ORTH, of Indiana. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no." I was very anxious to vote against this amendment and for the silver bill, but I cannot decline the request of Mr. ORTH to pair with him. During my absence from this House some weeks ago in consequence of serious sickness in my family, that gentleman did me the favor to pair with me, and now, when he is necessarily absent, I take pleasure in extending to him the same courtesy he extended to me.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MILLER.

Mr. McLANE. I have been paired on this bill with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BLAND; but I have withdrawn that pair and I now wish to vote for the bill. Upon this amendment I vote "no."

Mr. RICHMOND. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. PRESCOTT. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. CLAFLIN. The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. JORGENSEN, is paired with his colleague, Mr. BEALE.

Mr. FORSYTHE. On this bill and the amendments thereto I am paired with Mr. WALTER A. WOOD, of New York.

Mr. ELLIS. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HARMER.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, cannot a brief time be given to gentlemen to state their reasons for their votes on this question? [Cries of "Oh, no!"] Then I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I desire to inquire of the Chair how I can get it stated upon the record that I would have voted for this bill but for the amendment adopted yesterday on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to the ninth section.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate, which is not in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE. I believe that this amendment destroys the effect of the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] to the fourth section, and will practically take from the Government the difference between the market value of bullion and the legal-tender or face value of the silver dollar. While I vote in this way, I am still, as I always have been, a bimetallist.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Chair hopes the gentleman will observe the rules.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute of Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. WARNER. I call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The agreement already made is equivalent to ordering the previous question.

Mr. CONGER, Mr. GARFIELD, and others called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 97, not voting 74; as follows:

STATISTICAL REPORTS OF INTERNAL COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant in regard to the publication and submission to Congress of the second and third annual reports of the Bureau of Statistics on internal commerce. It is very long. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that it shall be read? If not, it will lie upon the table until the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] the mover of the resolution, shall be in the Chamber.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the report be printed and lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF SUBSIDIARY COINS.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal-tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance in section 3, line 3, to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coins shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10 in full payment of all dues public and private.

On this amendment the Senator from Delaware is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have no desire to repeat what was said on the last day this bill was under consideration as to the pending amendment, and as it was agreed upon by the Committee on Finance I ask its adoption.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is something, Mr. President, it appears to me, that is radically out of joint about the subject of this bill. The theory of small coins that are debased in order to keep them from being melted up, exported, &c., is that the Government shall not issue them to an extent that will work a depreciation. They will be valuable as tokens up to their apparent nominal value just as long as the quantity is kept down to a point where they are really needed for circulation. I take it I am simply stating an axiom in the philosophy of this affair in saying that.

Now it is said, and correctly I have no doubt, that these subsidiary silver coins are at a considerable discount, 1 or 2 or 3 per cent., I do not know how much. I think a day or two ago the quotation was from 1 to 1½ per cent. That must prove one of two things, either that the Government has issued more of these small coins than is necessary for the business interests of the community or, as was stated the other day, that there is a scarcity of these coins in some parts of the country and a glut and exuberance in the great centers of trade, the cities. When you come to that branch of the subject, (assuming for the sake of the argument that the Government has not issued more than the whole uses of community require,) then I submit to the consideration of Senators whether it is any part of the proper duty of the Government, whether it is a duty that it can perform if it undertakes it, to equalize circulation and to take in this money at the centers and carry it out to the circumference again in order to have it run through the mill once more, with any success at all.

Every kind of money will go to the places where debts are due as long as people are honest, and where capital in private hands is the most extended, the greatest in quantity. That is clear enough. If this be merely a matter of a glut in the city of New York, for illustration, and a matter of scarcity in Chicago or Saint Louis and on the Pacific slope, for another illustration, then I say that is a matter which the Government of the United States cannot properly deal with under any circumstances in respect of small coin any more than in respect of large coins or in respect of paper money circulation. That belongs to the private interests of the people of the United States; and when this good and expanded and expansive and paternal and National and State-rights Government of ours goes into the business of undertaking to keep the circulation of money among the people perfectly even, so that there will be not too much in one place and not too little in another, it will have undertaken a business that it will certainly fail in and that it will not do any good to the people by trying.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to say to the Senator in that connection that I think from what I have been able to learn of the condition of things in the West there is even greater suffering on account of the surplus subsidiary silver west of Chicago and perhaps at Chicago and Saint Louis than there is elsewhere, except at the great centers of which he speaks. I know in my own State the banks all through the State have been receiving subsidiary silver on deposit until they have got to a point where they cannot receive it any longer. The distance for shipment is so great, the centers so remote, that they find themselves in a situation where they cannot possibly receive that kind of deposits, and therefore the people have no place to put this subsidiary coin, and the demand for relief is very great.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt the Senator is quite right. It is exactly so in the little State that I have the honor in part to represent, a rural State with no great centers of commerce. The small coins, the half dollars, and in fact that glorious and magnificent thing called "the dollar of the fathers," fall in the same category. Nobody wants it and nobody will have it if he can get anything else, not because everybody in my State is not hungry for money, but the people are hungry for something that does not tell a lie on the face of it. They want a piece of money that tells the truth. If it says "five cents," they want it to be worth five cents; if it says "ten cents," or twenty, or twenty-five, or fifty cents, or a dollar, they want it to tell the truth on the face of it, that it contains the metal which is worth those respective sums that I have named in running up the coins of the United States. That is where the real trouble is.

We have succeeded in our patriotic efforts to restore the days of the fathers and the money of the fathers so much beyond our most sanguine expectations (as the late Commissioner of Agriculture used to say about running over his appropriations) that we have put off upon the people a variety of metals with our stamp upon them, the stamp not representing what it professes to represent as a truth. When it says on the silver dollar "this is a dollar," everybody who has occasion to use that coin finds out that for all business purposes it is not a dollar; and when you come to the half dollar it is still worse, because there is less silver, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] stated the other day, in two half dollars than there is in one unit dollar, and so on down in the subsidiary coins.

That is where the grief is, and therefore I submit that all this species of legislation is a salve that will not heal the wound. As long as you continue to issue this species of money that does not come up in point of weight and fineness to what it purports to be on its face, you will continue to go wrong.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senator from Vermont if he does not consider the issue of subsidiary coin in the place of what was called the fractional currency a step towards healing the wound that he speaks of?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, it was a step, and a very good step, taken under the act of 1875.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me while I answer his question, that goes back to the first observation I submitted when I rose. A subsidiary coin for the purposes of change, a debased coin in all countries almost, has been found to be necessary in the long run, and the only justification for that debasement is in the fact that the power that issues it is to stop when it has reached the point in the issue where there is enough of this debased coin to answer the purposes of a token coinage. Looked at in that point of view the issue of this subsidiary coin in the place of fractional currency was perfectly correct, but we have been going on all the time coining and coining and paying out to every quarter of the United States, everywhere, these subsidiary coins until, according to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, and according to my own observation in the North, and the statements of people elsewhere, there is more of these small debased coins in the country than the business of the country requires.

Mr. FERRY. Right here——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me a moment.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Senators will excuse me one moment until I complete my statement. It was said the other day that one reason for this was what now turns out to have been apparently an error, and that was that while there was not an excess of this coin on the whole, it like all other money had got into the hands of people who were entitled to it in great cities, &c., and that it was scarce in country places; and therefore the Government was to step in and to go into the express business, taking it out of the wells of the great cities and carrying it into the interior, and pouring it out into circulation again until it shall have run through. Upon that I had the honor to submit, as it appeared to me, that that was an undertaking which no government could properly enter into, and it would be disastrous if it did, because in that point of view you cannot distinguish between small coin and large coin. If it is right for the United States to undertake this banking and express business of taking the small coins from New York and carrying them to Vermont and Alaska, and wherever the perimeter of the United States may be, then it will be right to do the same with silver dollars, with gold dollars, with paper dollars, and with everything else.

Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I see I am getting into a hornets' nest; I will allow everybody.

Mr. BOOTH. I beg the Senator's pardon if I disturb his equanimity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. BOOTH. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Vermont wherein he has found any provision in this bill for the transmission of coin or for the Government going into the express business?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that all?

Mr. BOOTH. That is all the question I wish to ask.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In what I said,—perhaps my expression was not fortunate,—I took up the observation of somebody made on Friday last, that one of the motives of the bill was to reduce the accumulation in the large cities and increase the circulation in the other places. There is a section of the bill that provides for the exchange of this coin at the Treasury for lawful money; that is to say, in the opinion of the honorable Senator from Ohio who now occupies the chair, greenbacks, and, in the opinion of the honorable Senator in charge of this bill, other coins of the United States, they being in his opinion as in mine the only lawful money of the United States at this present time. It was said that that means of exchange was to take in this small coin, issue to the holder of it paper money in the eyes of the Senator from Ohio, and I will take that for the illustration, and that paper money being presented at the office of any assistant treasurers of the United States in the most distant Territory calls for small coin again, if the holder wants it. The small coin is payable on demand for paper money thus issued at the assistant treasurer's office in Montana, and paper money is issued for that in New York. If that does not imply that the United States must transport this small coin from New York where it has redeemed it to the place where somebody wants it in the Territories, then I do not understand the effect of the language.

Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. BOOTH. I wish to read the provision of the bill as to that particular subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; that is what we are on now.

Mr. BOOTH. The second section provides that—

> The Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any coins under the provision of this act shall exchange the same in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, for lawful money of the United States, on demand of any holder thereof.

The Treasurer does not send it to any other place. If he receives it he can pay it out on the demand of any man who has lawful money to exchange, but he does not send it to anybody else; he does not distribute it. He holds it until somebody comes for it, and the distribution is done by the people who want it, as it is paid in by the people who do not want it, without any expense to the Government whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If one of the people who wants it happens to come to an assistant treasurer's office in a distant Territory with his twenty-dollar greenback that somebody has got for twenty dollars in New York, and says "I want subsidiary coin for this," is not the assistant treasurer to pay it to him? It was stated in the last debate about this bill that this was an interchangeable affair, that anybody could get subsidiary coin for lawful money, that is, Ohio greenbacks, anywhere at any assistant treasurer's office in the United States; and he can get lawful money, Ohio lawful money, for small coins at any assistant treasurer's office in the United States.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator from Vermont now allow me to interrupt him, as he has yielded to other Senators, and I have been standing here patiently?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to remind the Senator from Vermont that the maximum of this silver currency that can be issued is $50,000,000. The object of the establishment of subsidiary silver was to supplant the fractional currency, and the maximum of subsidiary silver coin authorized was $50,000,000. About $40,000,000 of that amount is out; so that the greatest amount that can be possibly issued, if the whole of the fractional currency were retired, would be $50,000,000. Thus there is a bar to any excessive issue. Now, the object of this bill is to appreciate the value of that subsidiary silver, to make it more valuable, which is right in the line of the policy which has always been advocated by the Senator from Vermont. Therefore I cannot see why the bill should not receive his most hearty concurrence, since it appreciates the subsidiary coin and there is a prohibition against an excessive issue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One good turn deserves another, and I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

Mr. FERRY. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know why this subsidiary coinage needs appreciation. What is the matter with it now?

Mr. FERRY. For the reason that it is below the standard value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does it get below?

Mr. FERRY. The banks are unwilling to receive it upon deposit, and it accumulates in certain places as a drug. The object of the bill is to provide that in sums of $20 or multiples thereof it shall be convertible into greenbacks, and of course the greenbacks will be convertible into gold, thus bringing up the subsidiary silver in sums of $20 and its multiples equal to gold. That is the object of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. And I will remind the Senator that it is not now a legal tender.

Mr. FERRY. This bill also provides that up to $10 the subsidiary coin shall be made a legal tender.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but that is not the question I am asking. I am asking the Senator from Michigan how it happens that this subsidiary coin is below par?

Mr. FERRY. Simply because there is more alloy in it than there is in the standard value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am afraid that is not a correct answer.

Mr. FERRY. It has rather more fiat in it than the other has.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not a correct answer. Taken alone, philosophically it ought to be a correct answer; but we all know perfectly well that these small coins are not below par until you get an excess of quantity more than are wanted for the purposes of trade. Then you come around to the argument that was urged on Friday in view of that fact by saying, "Yes, that is true enough, but in the course of trade too many of them have got in one place and too few in another place, and, therefore, it is the business of the United States to take from where there is too much and carry it to some distant point where there is too little."

Mr. BOOTH. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I will state that the reason why, when this coinage reaches a certain amount, it becomes more valueless is because there is no way of disposing of it. To a certain amount bankers and others who are handling it say, "we will use it and circulate it;" but when it accumulates in the banks to large amounts so that they cannot use it they find it a drug, and the accumulation becomes too large. Now, the object of the bill is to provide that if it accumulates in excess of the amount needed the bankers can then convert it into greenbacks, and the greenbacks are convertible into gold. When this is established, then there will never be that accumulation which gives it much less value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That comes right back to the old proposition, no more and no less, which is stated by the Senator from Michigan himself in different language, and that is as long as the subsidiary and debased coin that is put out is kept down to a certain limit of amount, it will be at par, and when you get above that limit, it will not be at par. That is all clear enough. We find that it is not up to par. It therefore follows that you have got out too much, or else the statement made the other day is the explanation of it, that not having out too much there is too much in one place and too little in another. Senators seem to be a little shy of claiming that it is any part of the business of the United States to rectify that, if you have not got out too much. I do not know which is true. I think you have got out too much from the circumstance that the Senator from Nebraska states. But then here comes the other point of view. The Senator from Michigan says that this is to make the subsidiary coins equal to gold, because you can turn them into greenbacks and the greenbacks are equal to gold. If the Senator would only point out to me the law, that I wish he could, that made the greenbacks redeemable in gold, a single standard of value, then I should be glad to agree with him that it would make them equal to gold; but the twenty-dollar greenback that my friend takes or his $20 in half dollars is not redeemable in gold. The Secretary of the Treasury, like every other debtor, where there are two objects with which he can pay, is lawfully authorized to tender to his creditor either of two coins. Each of them being a legal tender, the Secretary of the Treasury has a perfect right to tender twenty silver dollars for any twenty-dollar greenback that is presented to him. He is not bound to redeem in gold.

Mr. FERRY. But the twenty dollars that are paid out for the redemption of the greenbacks are not in the subsidiary silver coin I remind the Senator, but coin of the standard value which is made by law equal to gold. It is a legal tender, it is the substance with which the greenbacks are redeemable—silver as well as gold. It is for that reason that the Secretary of the Treasury was very happy in his statement to the Committee on Finance that the remonetization of silver was a great help to him in the way of resumption, because it gave him two substances with which to redeem silver and gold. The two are alike, as far as the law makes it so.

Now, I say to the Senator that there cannot be an excessive accumulation of the subsidiary silver, because the law confines the aggregate to fifty millions, and the Senator does not meet my point there. There cannot be an excess beyond fifty millions; and fifty millions was the amount of fractional currency issued, and the subsidiary silver was authorized to that maximum in order to take the place of the fractional currency. It has not reached that maximum yet, and until it reaches that there will not be an excess if there is a proper distribution. The Senator says that it accumulates in localities, is not properly distributed——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not say that.

Mr. FERRY. This bill provides for its proper distribution, because it gives it a value that will secure it currency throughout the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Michigan urged as one of the reasons why this would turn out to be a panacea for all our ills, that it made this money equal to gold, first by making it equal to a greenback which was equal to gold. Now he states, and states correctly, that it is not equal to gold, for the reason that silver will answer the demands of anybody who holds a greenback just as well as gold will; and anybody who carries on the Treasury upon business principles alone, saying nothing about the policy and honor of the Government, like any other debtor, would pay his creditor in the best commodity he had that would answer the contract. I take it if any Senator had a contract with a fellow Senator to deliver wheat or rye in equal quantities, and his creditor came, and he found that rye was worth ten cents a bushel less than wheat, he would tender rye. He would have a perfect right to do so; it would not be immoral to do so because it was exactly what the contract called for. Where a debtor has a right to pay in one of two commodities, he has a right to choose that commodity in which he will pay. Therefore all that you do really in respect of this subsidiary coin which you now propose to redeem in greenbacks, is to say that you will make this subsidiary coin redeemable in silver dollars, and then you will find within a year or two that there will come here a cry from this whole country "You have established the principle of redeeming the coins of the United States; here are your silver dollars that are 3 per cent. off or 10 per cent. off, at a discount, depreciated; redeem these; make these up to par in the commercial sense of the word." What are you going to do then? I shall wait, Mr. President, with some curiosity to see what you are going to do then on the principle of this bill.

The real truth is, as everybody who hears me will see on a moment's reflection, that the theory of the coinage of metal is not the theory of redemption. We only redeem promises. We stamp coins and put them forth to anybody that wants them as a piece of metal that the United States has said contains so much silver or gold or copper or whatever it is, and then the law says that those metals in their respective degrees shall be a legal tender, some of them for only $5 as the law stands now, and others for all amounts. The business of the Government, therefore, is done in my judgment, on any just theory of government in respect of its coins, when it has assayed the metal, turned it into a coin, and stamped it truly with its weight and fineness, and hence with its ostensible value. Then everybody sees it. We do not propose to redeem the gold coins of the United States, or the silver coins. No nation ever undertook to redeem its coins, it does not undertake to do it, it is no part of its business to do it. There is nothing in passing out a coin which implies a promise on the part of anybody to do anything; it is merely a governmental inspection of the precious metals that are supposed to be the most convenient for the purposes of money; and stamping upon them, so that every one of its citizens will know exactly how much silver or gold or copper they contain. And then it provides upon principles of policy that certain weights and finenesses of these metals shall for the purposes of trade represent certain sums of what is called money. That is all there is to it.

It seems to me that the intrinsic evil in the philosophy of this bill is in undertaking the business of redeeming coin, because it is redemption and nothing else; just as if it were a promise of the Government to pay a debt which it is bound to redeem. I say that in principle you cannot distinguish in respect of redeeming subsidiary coins and the larger ones the moment they are depreciated, and the true remedy for a depreciation of subsidiary coins is to take them in and melt them up. I do not deny the propriety of the United States taking in an excess of its subsidiary coins, if there is an excess; but instead of taking them in to put them out again, it is to take them in at the price it got for them and keep them in; so that those which are left will answer the purposes for which they were designed of small transactions and change, and will stay as change on account of the fact that they are debased and will be of full value on account of the fact that there are not more of them than are wanted for that purpose.

I do not expect, Mr. President, to interpose any obstacle to the passage of this bill; but I want, like a great many other prophets of evil, to point out, so that my skirts will be clear, that you are taking a step that involves a policy and a duty on the part of this Government which will work disastrously.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I desire to say in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Vermont that the subsidiary silver was issued to retire the fractional currency, and the fractional currency was issued for value received. Silver takes the place of the fractional currency. The Government, therefore, has had the benefit first of the fractional currency and then of the value of the subsidiary silver; and now the proposition of this bill is to convert in sums of $20 and multiples thereof this subsidiary silver into legal-tenders or greenbacks, thus simply providing a means by which the Government shall redeem just what it paid out. The Government having received value for the subsidiary silver, now adopts a method through this bill by redeeming that in the greenbacks, so that nobody is defrauded, the people get the equivalent, having taken the silver from the Government and now return it to the Government and receive greenbacks which are a legal tender and of full value with gold. That is simply the proposition of this bill.

Now, if I understand the Senator from Vermont, if the subsidiary silver was on the standard basis of 412½ grains to the dollar he would have no objection to an unlimited issue of the subsidiary silver; that is, to the maximum authorized in the act providing for the issue of silver coin. If that be the case, what objection can there be to a bill which provides that a less valuable coin, to wit, the subsidiary coin, shall in sums of $20 and multiples thereof be brought to par with the standard value, for it is thus convertible into greenbacks the same as the standard silver coin?

I say to the Senator very frankly that if I had the opportunity, and whenever I shall have that opportunity, I shall be in favor of placing our subsidiary coin on the standard basis, making our silver all alike in fineness, whether the fractional or the full dollar. We are producing silver so largely that it is the proper policy to pursue. It opens a larger place for our silver and would give a larger volume of circulation. There is no need now of subsidiary silver coin because silver is not at a premium as it was before it was demonetized; now it is at a depreciated value, and therefore we should legislate to appreciate it, and place all of our coin, since it is the redeeming quality, alike, both gold and silver, upon a par value. I believe if all our silver, subsidiary as well, was placed on the standard value of 412½ grains to the dollar, it would gradually go to the value of gold; the two would come together, for they both serve the same purpose in the redemption of the greenback, which seems now practically to be the present standard.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to a question?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to ask him what will be the effect of this bill upon this volume of $41,485,438.56 of fractional subsidiary coin now in circulation? Will it keep it in circulation or will it take it all into the Treasury and produce a contraction of from fifteen to thirty-five million dollars?

Mr. FERRY. It will practically bring it to the value of standard silver and quicken its circulation. There will be freedom of circulation then; there will be no object to retain it, because it may be paid out on the same basis as standard silver or gold.

Mr. COCKRELL. Another question: Will this bill appreciate the relative value of silver as compared to the standard of gold?

Mr. FERRY. It will appreciate the value of subsidiary coin, because it places it in $20 and multiples thereof equal to the standard dollar. The Senator understands that. It is not of the same intrinsic value that the standard dollar is, but this bill proposes in sums of $20 and multiples thereof to make it equal to the standard dollar. Therefore this bill is in the line of advancing the value of the fractional silver coin, or, in other words, preventing its depreciation. The moment you depreciate the coin, that moment you make it the interest of parties taking it to discriminate against it. Those having it must of course get rid of it the best way they can or hold it. But you bring it up to the full value of standard silver and you give it equality and free circulation, because it will answer all the purposes of commercial exchange that the standard silver dollar or the gold dollar does.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then how will it get out of the Treasury when it has been once put in and greenbacks issued for it? Who will take it from the Treasury?

Mr. FERRY. It will be paid out from the Treasury. Banks and people will take it then, because it will answer every purpose of the standard dollar. It is suggested by the Senator from New York that even the gold dollars will be exchanged for this very silver because the silver fractional currency is needed. There must be a certain amount of fractional currency in the hands of the people, of individuals transacting business. That is a necessity. The law has contemplated that by providing for the supply of the fractional currency with these subsidiary coins.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Government and the Secretary of the Treasury use these fractional coins or subsidiary coins paid into the Treasury in liquidation of the interest on the public debt or maturing bonds?

Mr. FERRY. It will to any party who will take it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the Senator from Michigan in favor of that?

Mr. FERRY. I am in favor of it because if I want $20 of fractional currency made equal in value to, as $20 it also answers the purpose of the standard dollar, to meet a necessity I am ready to receive it. I can tell the Senator that it is an occurrence of almost every day that Senators step into the cashier's room here and exchange legal-tender greenbacks for subsidiary silver coin because they want the fractional coin.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Michigan certainly does not mean to be understood in his answer to the Senator from Missouri as saying that the Government can compel holders of its debt to receive fractional coin?

Mr. FERRY. Not at all. I said it can pay it out to any party who will take it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not so understand.

Mr. HOAR. The question was, could the Government pay it for interest on the public debt, to which the Senator replied it could. That answer might be misunderstood. I am sure the Senator did not mean that.

Mr. FERRY. I did not mean that, as I did not stop there, because I added "to any party willing to take it." The Senator must not omit part of my remark and construe it as the whole.

Mr. HOAR. I was afraid it might be misunderstood.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Missouri, I see by the twinkle of his eye, thinks I made that error. The Senator and I do not differ on this question, and therefore he will take my whole sentence, and it will run to the extent of the willingness of the people to receive the coin; and if this bill becomes a law, to the extent of $10 it will be a legal tender. The Secretary of the Treasury can compel parties to take it to that amount.

Mr. COCKRELL. Compel the holder of the public securities?

Mr. FERRY. To the amount of $10, because it will be a legal tender to that extent in payment of all Government securities that do not express payment on their face otherwise.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very much gratified to hear the Senator from Michigan take that position.

Mr. BAYARD. I should be gratified if a vote could be taken on this bill before the regular order is called, and I do not propose, therefore, to further debate the question. I had supposed it was well understood that the reason why governments issued subsidiary coinage was for the domestic convenience of their people, and that for the purpose of continuing the coin within their own jurisdiction they debased it purposely that it should not have an international value. Therefore all values of subsidiary coin are created by statute. In this country we have limited the token coinage of nickel and the like by the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who when he discovers that the quantity of token coinage is redundant is authorized to direct that such coinage shall cease until otherwise ordered by him. Just so in respect to our subsidiary silver coinage, the act of 1876 passed on the 22d of July expressly limits the amount of subsidiary silver coinage to $50,000,000, and of that but about $41,000,000 have been issued and are now in circulation. But the experience of the business of the country has shown that this subsidiary coin becomes redundant in certain spots and exceedingly scarce in others, and therefore the very reasonable application is made to the Treasury of the United States and to the Congress of the United States that they shall facilitate the exchange of subsidiary coin at such points as it may be found in redundancy for the lawful money of the United States at the sub-treasuries and Treasury of the United States when it shall be brought there in convenient sums, say multiples of $20.

I could present to the Senate the common-sense view of convenience of this subject as illustrated by the letters of merchants all over the country. One that I have in my hand will do to express their practical view of the effect of the redundancy of subsidiary coins at certain centers. This writer says:

> The retail grocers of the country are perhaps interested to as great an extent as any other class, for they receive large quantities of subsidiary silver coin which they in turn are obliged to pay to their wholesale merchants. If we keep these men as customers we cannot refuse to take the money which they receive; but we cannot pay it out in large sums nor can we deposit it in the banks; so we are obliged to sell it to the money-brokers at a discount. Our losses on some days' transactions have exceeded $100. It would seem as if the United States ought to provide some method to relieve citizens from this loss and inconvenience.
> The old fractional currency was satisfactory in this respect; and the substitute for it, fractional silver, could be made so by this simple expedient.
> We notice that some Senators were under the impression that such a bill would be in the interest of the money-dealers. It could only be so to the extent of what subsidiary coin they had on hand, and this should not militate against the permanent convenience that it would be to the entire community.
> If necessary, we could flood you with petitions favoring this measure; but its merits are so obvious and the press has so generally favored it that we have not thought it necessary.
> It seems to us plain that there should be some measure which would relieve parties who get too much fractional silver from its inconvenience, and enable persons in different parts of the country who may want it to send to the United States depositaries and procure supplies.

I am disposed to think that these statements are not only correct but reasonably so.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry at that point?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I appreciate entirely the necessity to which that letter adverts and to which the Senator has referred, and I wish to vote for this bill if I can do so; but first of all I would like to understand from the Senator from Delaware its meaning. I observe that in the first section occur the words, "silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than one dollar." If the Senator will now turn over to section 3, I observe the phraseology there changes, and the words are "present fractional or subsidiary silver coins." I should like to inquire whether those two phrases are supposed to be or are intended to be synonymous?

Mr. BAYARD. I will state to the Senator that the bill was reported in the House of Representatives with sections numbered 1 and 2. The sections 3 and 4 coming from individuals in the House do not follow the language of the House committee, but I should think the phrases are practically synonymous. Whether you speak of "any silver coin under the denomination of one dollar" or whether you call it "fractional or subsidiary silver coin" you mean the same thing.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will only suggest to the honorable Senator that as the bill is to be sent back to the House, it seems to me it would be well to employ in the third section the same phraseology which is used in the first section to designate the same thing; and if the Senator agrees with me, he will consent to strike out the words "fractional or subsidiary" and introduce after the word "coins" the words "of smaller denominations than one dollar."

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think that would be at all objectionable, and I suppose the reason why the phraseology differs in the two sections is on account of the facts I have stated.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly the Senator has explained that, but I suggest to him it would hardly be wise to continue this difference of language.

Mr. BAYARD. I see not the least objection to the amendment; on the contrary, I think the difference now found occurs from the manner of drafting the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I want to make another inquiry relative to section 4 which as changed by the committee reads:

> That all silver coins of the United States of the face value of twenty-five cents and under shall be received at all post-offices for the payment of postage or the purchase of postage-stamps in any sums not exceeding $3.

I infer that the object of that change is to include copper and nickel coins and I inquire of the Senator——

Mr. BAYARD. They are already legal tender to the amount of twenty-five cents.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, I inquire of the Senator what the effect of this section, as the committee report it, will be upon the half-dollar pieces? I know there is an existing provision of law touching half dollars; but should this bill become a law as of this date, it will be a subsequent enactment and an enactment giving authority, requiring, if you please, postmasters to receive silver pieces twenty-five cents in value, or of any value less than twenty-five cents up to the amount of $3. What would the Senator say is the true construction of the law touching half dollars? Will postmasters be at liberty, in the presence of this enactment if enactment it becomes, to say that half dollars are provided for under a previous law, and twenty-five cents and less coins under this law, and that taking the two laws together a man may come with half dollars——

Mr. BAYARD. To the extent of $10, I take it, under the third section.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I inquire again why should not this section also follow the language which occurs in the first section and show plainly on its face that the meaning is that this shall be true of all coins of less denomination than $1. Why should a question of construction be left by specifying twenty-five cent pieces?

Mr. BAYARD. I would say "all silver coins."

Mr. CONKLING. I mean silver coins; my point now is not as to "silver." I am simply upon this point now: We as of this date are to put upon the statute-book a direction that a certain thing may be done in respect of twenty-five cent pieces and other silver coins of a less denomination than twenty-five cents. Do you not create great doubt whether you intend to leave standing prior provisions of law touching fifty-cent pieces? Dropping down to section 5, there is a provision—

> That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

I ask the Senator to take that into consideration when he answers the last question I put him, namely, whether he does not at least leave an uncertainty and confusion in respect of half dollars?

Mr. BAYARD. I see no objection whatever, on the contrary I see a manifest propriety that the same phraseology should be applied to accomplish the same intent in all four sections. The history of the fourth section is somewhat like the history of the third. It also was an afterthought and put upon the bill after it came to the House, and therefore never underwent the revision of the House committee. The object of our committee was to differ from the House as little as possible. I see no objection whatever to the adoption of the same phraseology descriptive of the coin in the first section, in both the third and fourth sections.

Mr. TELLER. Why not strike out the words "of the face value of twenty-five cents and under?"

Mr. BAYARD. Senators will observe that when the bill came to the Senate from the Committee on Finance it was "all coins of every description," including the copper coins and the nickel coins. That obviously would have been exceedingly inconvenient to the post-office authorities; and the amendment of the committee is to confine it to the silver coins. That, we thought, would change the frame-work of the bill as it came to us, less than to adopt the language of the first section; but I am disposed to yield and admit that it would be more ship-shape if all the sections contained the same phraseology as to the money meant to be designated.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will venture to move to amend section 3 by striking out in the first line the words "fractional or subsidiary"——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Chair to allow me to state my amendment that it may at least be pending. I move to strike out the words "fractional or subsidiary" in line 1 of the third section and in line 2 after the word "coins" to insert "of smaller denominations than one dollar," so as to read:

Present silver coins of smaller denominations than one dollar.

And I think the words "of the United States" should be there, so as to read, "silver coins of the United States" * * * "shall hereafter be a legal tender," &c.

Mr. BAYARD. The words "of the United States" are already in practically.

Mr. CONKLING. Then in section 4 I move to amend by striking out in line 2 the words "of the face value of twenty-five cents and under," and inserting in lieu of those words the words "of smaller denominations than one dollar," so that that section will read:

That all silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than one dollar shall be received at all post-offices, &c.

Mr. BAYARD. Following the language of the first section.

Mr. CONKLING. Exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 206) relative to the transportation of animals.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that that measure be laid aside informally that we may proceed with the consideration of this bill for a few minutes longer.

Mr. McPHERSON. I can scarcely consent to that, because in my opinion it will take a long time to complete this bill. There are many speeches to be made on it, no doubt.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to hear me a moment. Nobody objects to these two amendments of mine; it will take but a moment to vote upon them. Suppose he allow a vote to be taken on these amendments which are agreeable to the committee and relieve some doubts that others have had.

Mr. BECK. I do not desire to speak upon it, but I certainly object to the last amendment of the Senator from New York. The effect of that is to limit the post-offices in receiving half dollars as legal tender to $3, when the House made it $20, and we admit it shall be $10, and it is now five for all other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We may as well have the regular order.

Mr. TELLER. Before this bill goes over I submit an amendment to it and move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to ask that the unfinished business be laid aside informally in order to enable the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] to call up his bill as he has given notice that he desires to speak, the unfinished business to be taken up immediately after the Senator from Indiana concludes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the unfinished business be laid aside informally subject to his call, in order that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] may move to take up the bill introduced by him. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, does that mean that the discussion of the military bill is to be confined to the Senator from Indiana alone?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from New Jersey was that his bill might be laid aside informally subject to his call, in order that the Senator from Indiana might move to take up the bill introduced by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose some other Senator should like to submit a few observations when the Senator from Indiana shall have concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a matter about which the Chair can give no information.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood the Senator from Indiana to have given notice that he desired to speak this morning, and also the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] I have since learned that the Senator from Pennsylvania does not desire to speak to-day. I had therefore concluded that perhaps no other Senator would desire to speak to-day on that bill, and I would ask to have my bill taken up immediately after the Senator from Indiana made his speech, that being laid aside informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as this appears to be a proposition which will prevent any possible reply to the Senator from Indiana if anybody should wish to make one, I think we had better take up the bill regularly, and then his remarks will be the subject of reply.

Mr. McDONALD. I will say that it is not my purpose to ask for a vote on my motion to refer to-day, as I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to speak to-morrow if an opportunity be accorded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey be agreed to, and the bill of the Senator from Indiana be taken up, debate on that can of course proceed until the Senator from New Jersey or some other Senator demands the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as the Senator from New Jersey puts it in the way he does, I should prefer that the bill that the Senator from Indiana wishes to speak to should be taken up in the regular way by postponing the New Jersey bill and taking this up, and then it will be up, and if any Senator desires to be heard after the Senator from Indiana is through, he will have an opportunity. Otherwise he would not; because the Senator from New Jersey could shut down the gate immediately the Senator from Indiana is through.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to add that the bill I wish the Senate to take action on is a very important bill, and one that we cannot afford to postpone very long. I have been detained from the Senate by illness, or I should have asked its consideration before. I propose, which I trust will meet the convenience of the Senate, to consider it to-day. It can be done to-day as well as any other time, perhaps, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate in that respect. The bill of the Senator from Indiana, after he has addressed the Senate, I propose to ask be laid aside. It will require a very few moments, I think, to dispose of Senate bill No. 206. It is one in which I feel a great interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if I understand it, the Senator from New Jersey intends to call for the regular order, if this suggestion be agreed to, the moment the Senator from Indiana has concluded?

Mr. McPHERSON. That is my intention.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the suggestion. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. McDONALD. Then I move to lay aside the pending order and take up the bill introduced by me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I hope will be done. It is not my object to cut off my friend from Indiana by any means, nor have I any present purpose of making any remarks myself to-day; but if the Senator from Indiana should happen to say something that seemed to require explanation at the moment, I do not think it right that gentlemen on the other side should be absolutely cut off.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not think there will be any difficulty about taking up the other bill afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to postpone the pending bill in order to proceed to the consideration of the bill introduced by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 206 is postponed. Does the Senator from Indiana move to take up the other bill?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir. I move to take up Senate bill No. 621.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No objection.

USE OF TROOPS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the United States shall be invaded or be in imminent danger of invasion, or whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed or the execution thereof obstructed in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings or by the power invested in the marshals by this act, and official information shall be furnished thereof by a judge of the Supreme Court or judge of any circuit or district court of the United States sitting or exercising judicial authority within the limits of any such State, or in case of any insurrection or domestic violence in any State against the government thereof, and the Legislature of such State or the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) has made application therefor, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may deem necessary to repel such invasion or to suppress such combination and to cause the laws to be duly executed, or to suppress such insurrection or put down domestic violence in such State; and the use of the militia so called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the next session of Congress.

SEC. 2. In all cases of invasion, insurrection, or domestic violence, or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of repelling such invasion or suppressing such insurrection or domestic violence, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ for the same purpose such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he shall judge necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect; but it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus or otherwise for the purpose of executing the laws except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress.

SEC. 3. The marshals of the United States in their respective districts shall have power to execute all lawful process and precepts to them directed and issued under the authority of the United States, and in the execution thereof shall have the power to command all necessary assistance.

SEC. 4. All laws and parts of laws heretofore enacted which are in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. All laws and parts of laws heretofore passed by the Congress of the United States, regulating the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, are hereby repealed.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, in a republican government the people should be free and uncontrolled in the selection of their Representatives, and the officers of election should be residents of the vicinage, well known to the electors and chosen by them.

The right to define the qualifications of electors under our system of government is reserved to the several States, subject only to such restrictions as are imposed by the Federal Constitution. The States also possess the absolute right of prescribing the times, places, and manner of elections for all State and local officers. Over this subject there has been no power delegated in the Constitution to the Federal Government. The States also, primarily, possess the power to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress; but power is conferred upon Congress to make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

This power, however, was never exercised in respect to the election of members of Congress, except as to time, until the passage of those laws now upon our statute-books by which the Federal Government was authorized, through officers and agencies provided for in them, to exercise an important control over the manner of conducting such elections. These laws provide for the appointment of an almost unlimited number of officers—heretofore wholly unknown to our people—called "supervisors of elections," who exercise a direct supervision over all elections at which members of Congress are to be chosen, and are entitled to a compensation of $5 each per day for a term not exceeding ten days at each election. A chief supervisor is appointed in each judicial district of the United States, to hold his office during good behavior, and is thus made an officer for life, unless removed by impeachment. He is charged with a general supervision of the registration and elections in his district. The compensation of this officer, as well as that of the special supervisors, is made a charge upon the general fund of the Treasury as a perpetual appropriation, and is payable out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

United States marshals in their respective districts, in all cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward, on the application of any two citizens residing in such city, are authorized to appoint without limit as to number special deputies to act in conjunction with the special supervisors. The special deputies, as well as the general deputies of the marshal, are clothed with the power to keep the peace generally and to support and protect the supervisors of elections in the discharge of their duties. In addition to this, on account of the special duties connected with the elections, it has been held by the Department of Justice that, under the general power to appoint one or more deputies to aid them in the discharge of their duties, the marshals may appoint as many general deputies throughout their districts as they please, so that in each judicial district an unlimited number of general and special deputies may be called into service in connection with the elections. The marshals are the appointees of the President, and are almost without exception in political accord with the Administration, and their appointees are of the same political complexion. This election machinery has been put in force to a greater or less extent at every congressional election since the passage of these laws, and the dynamitic power wrapped up in it is capable of indefinite expansion, so that it may be made to reach and influence every congressional district in the United States and indirectly the State and local elections of every State.

To aid in the working of this machinery, all powers of the Federal Government, executive, administrative, judicial, civil, and military, are subject to be called into exercise, and the agencies that move and control it are entirely removed from any direct responsibility to the people. It is true it does not take the election polls out of the control of the people's chosen election officers, but it so surrounds and overshadows them by the power of the Federal Government as to destroy the vital principle of popular elections and place it in the power of whatever party may for the time being control the exercise of executive power to perpetuate its authority.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, the power conferred on Congress to make or alter such regulations as might be prescribed by the several States for the election of members of Congress was strongly objected to. It was then feared that under this power Congress might contrive the manner of holding elections so as to exclude all but their own favorites from office, or to secure party triumphs. The objections to intrusting it to Congress are so strongly stated by Judge Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution that I shall take the liberty of reading the paragraph embracing them. It is as follows:

This clause does not appear to have attracted much attention or to have encountered much opposition in the convention, at least so far as can be gathered from the journal of that body. But it was afterward assailed by the opponents of the Constitution, both in and out of the State conventions, with uncommon zeal and virulence. The objection was not to that part of the clause which vests in the State Legislatures the power of prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections; for, so far, it was a surrender of power to the State governments; but it was to the superintending power of Congress to make or alter such regulations. It was said that such a superintending power would be dangerous to the liberties of the people and to a just exercise of their privileges in elections. Congress might prescribe the times of elections so unreasonably as to prevent the attendance of the electors, or the place at so inconvenient a distance from the body of the electors as to prevent a due exercise of the right of choice. And Congress might contrive the manner of holding elections so as to exclude all but their own favorites from office. They might modify the right of election as they should please; they might regulate the number of votes by the quantity of property, without involving any repugnancy to the Constitution. These and other suggestions of a similar nature, calculated to spread terror and alarm among the people, were dwelt on with peculiar emphasis.

On the other hand, it was contended by those who favored the clause that no danger was to be apprehended from any mal-use by Congress of such power; "that it would never be resorted to except to correct any negligence in the State in making provision for such elections," or to prevent a dissolution of the Government "by designing and refractory States urged on by some temporary excitement," or to secure regularity in the operations of the General Government "by a uniformity in time and manner of electing Representatives, so as to prevent vacancies when there might be calls for extraordinary sessions of Congress." As to the charge that parties might through it seek political advantages and party triumphs, the language of the learned commentator is so strong and denunciatory against the class of measures now in force that I shall take the liberty of quoting it at length. He says:

The truth is that Congress could never resort to a measure of this sort for purposes of oppression or party triumph until that body had ceased to represent the will of the States and the people, and if under such circumstances the members could still hold office it would be because a general and irredeemable corruption or indifference pervaded the whole community. No republican constitution could pretend to afford any remedy for such a state of things.

In the New York convention, called for the purpose of ratifying the Constitution, Mr. Jay, one of the ablest of its members, used the following language:

As far as he understood the ideas of the gentlemen (referring to those who opposed the clause) they seemed to have doubts with respect to this paragraph, and feared that it might be misconstrued and abused. Every government was imperfect unless it had the power of preserving itself. Suppose by design or accident the States should neglect to appoint Representatives, certainly there should be some constitutional remedy for this evil. The obvious meaning of the paragraph was, that if this neglect should take place Congress should have the power to support the Government and prevent the dissolution of the Union. He believed this was the design of the Federal Constitution.

The same construction was given to this clause in other State conventions, notably in Massachusetts, and it is quite evident from these discussions that if it had been believed that Congress would claim and exercise the power, as it has done in these latter days, the clause would have been rejected or so modified as to have guarded against this evil. The settled policy of the Federal Government accorded with the construction which the framers of the Constitution gave to this clause, and such continued to be the construction from the adoption of the Constitution down to 1870, when it was departed from upon the false plea of securing free and fair elections. It had then become apparent that the republican party was losing political control over the Southern States, and under the plea of securing to the freedmen of the South the right to vote, Congress provided laws by which the Federal Government assumed a controlling part in the elections, especially in those elections at which members of Congress were to be chosen. There was not a State that had neglected or refused to make suitable provisions for such elections, and the time and place of electing members of Congress in nearly every State was fixed upon the same day upon which their most important State elections took place.

In my own State our elections are held biennially, and every officer in the State, from the governor to a township trustee, is voted for on the same ballot and before the same election officers with members of Congress; and every safeguard that is thrown around our elections to secure their purity and freedom is equally extended to the elections of members of Congress, so that there is not and was not the slightest justification or excuse for Federal interference; yet this "evil legislation has been hammered and driven into the framework of our State government" so that it is impossible for our people to free themselves from its influence except by divorcing our State elections from congressional elections and thus incurring a double expense and loss of time and to still further remove the elections of members of Congress from popular control and place them under the influence of the political agents of the Administration.

The will of the majority expressed through the medium of the popular elections is the only mode by which the sovereign power of the people can be applied to control our public affairs; and therefore it is essential that those elections should be as free as possible from party control. It is not possible to wholly free them from party influence because the election officers who receive and count the ballots are themselves the members of one party or the other, and sympathize with their respective parties in their struggle for political power. Under State laws this evil effect of party bias is, in a great measure, counterbalanced by other causes. The laws provide for the formation of non-political boards by securing a representation for all parties in their composition. The election precincts are usually small and their boundaries defined, and the work of canvassing and declaring the results is merely ministerial so that the ballots of the voters as received and counted are aggregated and the results declared without being influenced or controlled by any great central power. Such, at least, were the election laws in all the States until the work of reconstruction began in that portion of the Southern States lately in rebellion, and such are still the laws in the several States except in a few of the Southern States that have retained the election machinery framed under the so-called reconstruction policy of the republican party.

When reconstruction began its work it was conducted under the shadow of the military. Martial law, in effect, supervised and controlled the provisional governments established within the States; and when those provisional governments gave place to organized State governments, in almost every instance the power of the people over the elections was displaced by political machinery which vested in the executive of the State the power of supervising and controlling them. Take Louisiana as an illustration. In that State there was not a single officer connected with the elections who was elected directly by the people. The governor appointed a State supervisor of registration. He also appointed a supervisor of registration and election for each parish and for each ward in the city of New Orleans. These supervisors, in turn, appointed the election officers in their respective parishes and wards, supervised the registration, and appointed the polling places, with no other restriction upon their powers of selecting the places of voting except that they were required to appoint at least one polling place in each justice's ward. In 1876 the supervisor of registration and election for the parish of West Feliciana fixed the polling place for the Eighth ward of the parish ten miles away from the ward. The judges of election were required to make their returns to the supervisor of registration, and he tabulated the returns thus sent to him, and forwarded them, or such as he saw proper, to the State board of canvassers, known in our political history as "the returning board of Louisiana."

In the election I have just referred to the supervisors of election purposely withheld from their returns over three thousand votes which had been returned to them by the officers of election, and from the parish of Grant the supervisor made no return at all, so that in that election the entire vote of Grant Parish and over three thousand votes polled in other parishes by the people were never considered or counted in the general canvass. The acting governor, who wielded the machinery of elections at that time, was himself a candidate for a seat in this body, which he now holds. This election machinery, with some variations, was extended over several other Southern States, and bears a striking family resemblance to the Federal laws now under consideration, and by its use the political adventurers, who by the aid of the Federal Government, supported by Federal bayonets, had seized upon the political power in those States, were enabled to maintain themselves year after year in the possession of that ill-gotten power in spite of the popular will until many of the Southern States were brought to the verge of bankruptcy and ruin.

It has been sought, Mr. President, by the republican party in and out of Congress, to stamp upon the controversy that has arisen over the effort that has been made to repeal the Federal election laws a sectional character, and to use it as a means of securing a solid North against what the republican leaders are pleased to style a "solid South." No effort has been made to defend these laws on any sound principle, but the intellect and eloquence of the ablest champions of the republican party have been employed in the endeavor to utilize sectional hate and to excite the fears and prejudices of the people of the Northern States against the people of the Southern States, while it is perfectly manifest that the North as a section is more interested in their repeal than the South. If the South has become solid it is because the maladministration of the republican party in the Southern States has made it so; and in the nature of things it will continue to oppose with a united front any party that shall seek to maintain political power in that section by attempting to govern it by placing ignorance over intelligence and subordinating civilization to barbarism. Withdraw the outside pressure that has encircled that section since the day that reconstruction began, and in a short time we shall have a divided South as well as a divided North, and political parties separated by geographical lines will soon be unknown to our politics.

Again, the advocates of these measures falsely charge that their repeal is a reactionary movement in favor of ultra State rights and would endanger the proper authority and power of the General Government. If by ultra State rights is meant the right of secession or nullification, it is not true that it is now or never was a democratic doctrine, as it certainly never was the principle of the Federal Constitution. From the days of Thomas Jefferson to the present time the democratic party as a party has ever maintained that the Federal Government, within the powers delegated to it by the Federal Constitution, was supreme. They have only claimed what the Constitution itself declares, that the powers not therein delegated to it nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States respectively and to the people; and the invasion of these reserved powers by the Federal Government is an unwarranted usurpation, as the nullification of the Federal authority by the States or by the people is an unauthorized rebellion. The democratic party is no more chargeable with the views held by Mr. Calhoun and his followers than is the republican party chargeable with like sentiments expressed in the Hartford convention.

My objections to these laws, Mr. President, are, first, that they are in violation of the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution, by seeking to interfere with or control the primary right of the States over the people's Representatives; second, that they surround the election-polls in the States with the political emissaries of the Administration, with power, if need be, to call to their assistance the military arm of the Government, under the pretense of keeping the peace at the polls; and, third, that this election machinery has been used, and if suffered to remain in force will be used again, for the mere purpose of securing party triumphs, and that this use is more to be feared throughout the Northern States than in any section of the Union. Take the election of 1878 as an illustration. In the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Ohio it is safe to say that by the aid of these laws the republican party was enabled to change the political complexion of at least ten congressional districts. Without this aid the House of Representatives of the present Congress would have a democratic majority of at least twenty, and by its use it is in the power of the Administration to control the elections of members of Congress in every close or doubtful district in the United States. In the city of Philadelphia during the last election there was employed an army of Federal officers numbering seven hundred and seventy-three deputy marshals and thirteen hundred and thirty-two supervisors of election, at a cost to the people of $41,170, a force that was wholly unnecessary for any purposes of a free and fair election, as was shown by the testimony of the marshal of that district in his examination before a committee of this body. The following is his testimony on that point:

By Mr. HOAR:

Question. I suppose you have had large experience in the city of Philadelphia. Are you a native of that city?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was born in that city.

Q. And lived there all your days?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In your judgment, would those elections have been safe from disorder and fraud without the precautions which you have described?

A. I believe they would.

Q. Without the precautions you have described? Suppose there had been no supervision or guarding by the deputy marshals, do you think there would have been danger of disorder or fraud in the elections?

A. In some localities there would, in others there would not. I think, as far as the appointment of supervisors and United States marshals for the city of Philadelphia is concerned, the city could do without them very well. She could protect herself without the law, as far as Philadelphia is concerned.

In the city of New York a still larger force at a still greater cost was employed, as has been repeatedly shown in this debate. In the city of Cincinnati two congressional districts were controlled by Federal emissaries, and the people cheated out of their choice. In the State of Massachusetts more money was paid out of the public Treasury to control the elections than in all the States lately in rebellion. Will her Senators in this Chamber say that this was necessary to secure a free and fair election of members of Congress? If not, for what purpose was this Federal machinery brought into play in that State? I suppose there can be but one answer to that question. It was to prevent the people of Massachusetts from selecting for their governor a certain person, well known to the history of this country, who had made himself obnoxious to the political leaders of that State.

General Butler is no personal or political favorite of mine, yet he is a man of great ability and is a citizen of Massachusetts. The people of that State had the right to choose him for their governor, but the leaders of the republican party did not think so and consequently foreign aid was called in to control the popular will. Deputy marshals were appointed; United States supervisors were appointed, and the people were taxed to defray the expenses incurred in defeating them of their choice. All this was done under the false pretense of providing for a free and fair election. The effect, therefore, of these laws, as already demonstrated by their practical working, is to interfere in State elections as well as to place it in the power of the Federal Administration to subordinate the popular branch of the Federal Congress to the control of the executive department of the Government, and to aid in this purpose the executive is vested with almost unlimited control over the military power of the country, with direct authority to station troops at the polls under the pretense of keeping the peace.

The President of the United States is "Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service of the United States." It is a fundamental principle of free government that the military should be held in strict subordination to civil authority. It was one of the specific grounds of complaint by the colonies against the King of Great Britain "that he had affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power." The principle of making the military strictly subordinate to the civil power was scrupulously guarded by the fathers of the Republic. There are three classes of cases in which a use of the military is not only proper, but often indispensable: they are, first, to repel invasion; second, to enforce the laws of the United States; third, to aid a State in suppressing insurrection against its authority, or to put pown domestic violence.

The power of the Executive to use the Army as its military commander to repel invasion has never been restricted, but has been left to his discretion. An armed invasion by a public enemy is war, and must be met at once by military power, and every President has been authorized to use it and vested with the power to decide on its necessity. But not so in the other two cases. The President is not a magistrate with authority to issue processes and precepts; there is another department of the Government clothed with that power—the judicial department; and while it is made his duty to take care "that the laws be faithfully executed," it is not right to clothe him with the authority to decide upon the question of their execution; and, therefore, in the earlier statutes regulating this duty it was expressly provided that when the laws of the United States were opposed in any State by a combination too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals, the President, upon receiving official information of that fact from an associate justice—that is, one of the supreme judges—or the district judge of proper district, was authorized to call in the aid of the military power to suppress such combinations and to cause the laws to be executed. So, when in any State there should be an insurrection against the government thereof, it was lawful for the President, on the application of the Legislature of such State, or the executive when the Legislature could not be convened, to use the military force of the United States to suppress such insurrection. And during the nullification excitement of 1832-'33, when it was thought necessary to clothe the President with what was regarded extraordinary powers to meet the exigency of the case, the statutes were carefully drawn to guard against the exercise of any arbitrary power on his part by requiring him to be officially informed by the authorities of the State, or by the proper Federal judge, of the existence of the facts creating the necessity for military aid, and the duration of the authority conferred was expressly limited in the act. The act of July 29, 1861, still upon our statute-books, was the first broad departure from these principles and vested in the President dictatorial powers. It is as follows:

Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

It will be seen that the power to judge of the exigency is vested in the President, and not in the courts nor in the State authorities. As President he decides and as Commander-in-Chief of the Army he executes, so that the judicial and civil as well as military authority in the premises is vested in the one department of government—the executive. It may be said that this act was passed during flagrant war and as a war measure. This may have justified its passage; it may also have justified the continuance of this power during the war; but it forms no justification for vesting such powers perpetually in the one department of government, the head of which is also the military chief of the country. During the war this great power was not only exercised by the President but by military commanders in various localities, as shown by numerous military orders issued in loyal as well as disloyal sections of the country, and was frequently leveled at persons whose only offense consisted in their opposition to the political measures of the Administration. Under it, or in misuse of it, elections were interfered with and the military used to control them in the interest of the republican party. I have heard it said in this Chamber that the military had never been used to control elections in this country. In my State, in 1864, a regiment of Massachusetts volunteers stationed at Indianapolis were permitted to leave their encampment on the day of election, and, with arms in their hands, suffered to surround the polls and not only exclude citizens from voting but were permitted to vote themselves, a privilege that they used most freely. This was done in my own view, and I saw these non-resident armed men insult and drive from the polls citizens of the State as loyal as themselves. Similar scenes were enacted in other parts of the State, as I have good reason to know.

These and other like abuses induced the passage of the act of 1865, by which it was made "unlawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, or keep or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election was held in any State of the United States of America, unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States." So read the bill as introduced by its author, Senator Powell, of Kentucky, but by the republican majority in the Senate it was amended by adding these important words, "or to keep the peace at the polls." The republican party then as now were unwilling to give up the power of exercising through their President military supervision over the elections. In 1871 an act was passed entitled "An act to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes."

The third section of this act has been changed by the revisers and carried into the Revised Statutes as a general law. It is section 5299, and is the third section under the title "Insurrection." As revised it confers upon the President the most absolute power in the use of the military in suppressing insurrections in the States and in enforcing the laws of the United States, making him the sole judge of the exigency and relieving him from any control on the part of any other department of the Government or from any State or local authority, so that instead of returning to constitutional and regular methods of civil government when the war was over, the republican party has added to the powers of the President even beyond what was thought necessary during the most urgent necessities of the civil war, so that we now have upon the statute-books laws that not only authorize and permit an unwarrantable interference in popular elections, but, what is more dangerous still, powers slumbering there capable of being exerted in establishing a military dictatorship.

The purpose of the bill I have had the honor to introduce is to aid in securing such just reforms as will relieve the country from the danger or apprehensions of danger of the exercise of arbitrary power by the President in the use of the military arm of the Government, and to place that important arm under the control of proper civil authority without crippling the President in any proper use of it, and by repealing all Federal laws relating to the manner of holding elections for members of Congress, to remit to the people and the States once more the right of free elections under their own laws. These objects the democratic party has endeavored to accomplish by the various measures which it has sought to pass into the forms of law and which have been so strenuously opposed by the republican party in this and the last session of Congress. No more important question has ever engaged the attention of the people of this country in the time of peace. It involves no less an issue than this: are our people, after passing through a civil war which taxed their energies to the utmost, and in which, for war purposes, they clothed their Executive with a most absolute power, capable, when the war is over, of re-establishing the civil administration of the Government by applying once more the checks and balances so necessary to secure popular rights; or will they, for the benefits and advantages that parties may derive from the exercise of such arbitrary power, suffer it to remain as a permanent part of our political system?

Our people have shown themselves equal to many emergencies and vindicated their capacity for self-government and for maintaining the guarantees of civil liberty on many occasions, and in my opinion they will do so now. The republican party in its opposition to these necessary reforms has made itself the champion of arbitrary power and of Federal interference in the elections, and in the end will be beaten. It is not a mere contest between the democratic party on the one hand and the republican party on the other, nor is it a controversy between the North and the South; it is a contest between the republican party in its effort to retain the control of the Government and the people in their endeavor to re-establish the principles of a just, representative republic. Every man in this country whose political future is not bound up in the success of the republican party is in favor of these just reforms, and in the contest to secure them the democratic party is but the mouth-piece and organ of the people, and no blunders or mistakes which it can make in its efforts to secure these reforms can cause their ultimate defeat.

I know it is a favorite saying among republican leaders that they have been enabled to maintain power heretofore on account of the mistakes made by the democratic party, but this is very far from being true, although from time to time they may have profited by such mistakes. I ask my republican friends to look back over the past. At the close of the war their party was in power in all the Northern States, and they held the Southern States as conquered provinces and molded them in their reconstruction policy as the potter molds the clay in his hands. The people felt grateful to the republican party because under its auspices the rebellion had been put down and the territorial integrity of the country preserved. It is true that on every battle-field the democrats of the Northern States stood side by side with republicans in support of the Union. In my own State the roll of the living and the dead will show a democrat of the rank and file for every republican, and among the most honored of the democrats of Indiana are to be found the names of Manson, Love, Gray, Slack, Shaw, Williams, and a host of others; yet the democratic party, because it insisted upon being true to its principles in opposing such political measures of the republican party as it believed to be wrong, was charged with disloyalty.

Fourteen years have passed away. How stands the case now? This arrogant and imperious republican party is in a minority in both branches of Congress, is in a minority in every State in the Union but four, and holds the executive power of this Government by commission of a political crime and against a popular majority of over 260,000 votes, and has no hope in the future except in its bad effort to array one section of the country against another. It requires no prophet to foretell its downfall, for it has been "weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from Indiana has been so interesting that I should be glad to occupy an hour or two in stating a few things that he appears to have omitted; but as the Senator from New Jersey desires to go on with the cattle bill, which is probably of more importance to the people of the United States than the bill of the Senator from Indiana, I think I will forego the few things that I have to say until the bill comes up the next time, and then if I can get the floor in due order I may have a few things to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The Senator from New Jersey moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 206.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) authorizing the payment of a portion of the Virginius indemnity fund to the mother of General W. A. C. Ryan;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 70) authorizing Commodore J. W. A. Nicholson, United States Navy, to accept from his Catholic majesty the King of Spain the grand cross of naval merit; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) authorizing Lieutenant Z. L. Tanner, of the United States Navy, late commanding Pacific Mail steamer City of Peking, to accept a pair of flower vases and a lacquered box from the Japanese government.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 178) to provide for the change of name of the steamer Alexis.

TRANSPORTATION OF ANIMALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 206) relating to the transportation of animals.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PADDOCK. This bill does not seem to have been considered by any committee of the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. It was reported from the Committee on Commerce, having been considered by them.

Mr. PADDOCK. The print before me does not purport to have been reported from a committee. It is simply "referred to the Committee on Commerce."

Mr. McPHERSON. This is identical with a bill passed by the Senate during the last session of Congress, which was reported by the Committee on Commerce at that time, considered by the Senate, and I think passed unanimously. For want of time it was not considered by the other House.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think it is different in some respects from that bill, as I read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The Chair will state that the bill which has been read is indorsed as reported on the 22d of May from the Committee on Commerce without amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. Then I have the wrong bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the wrong print.

Mr. PADDOCK. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill which has been read is one that is reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. None of us are able to get any bill except that introduced on the 26th of March, 1879.

Mr. TELLER. Is it not reported as introduced?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is reported back just as it was introduced.

Mr. TELLER. So that the print of March 26 is all right.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think there is not a change of any word save one from the bill passed at the last session. An amendment was offered at the last session by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] changing the word "sixty," in line 58 of the third page of the bill, to "forty-five." With that exception, there has been no change whatever.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is a very important change.

Mr. McPHERSON. In line 58, the Senate at the last session struck out the word "sixty" and inserted "forty-five." It reads, "sixty consecutive hours." In other respects the two bills are identical in character.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not exactly know when will be the proper time, but I wish to give notice that I shall offer an amendment to change the word "twenty-eight," in line 14, on the first page, to "twenty-four;" and that I will move to strike out, on page 7, all that part which is embraced between lines 144 and 160.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think I can give the Senator from Indiana some very good reasons why he should not do that.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will listen with pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Indiana that there are no amendments reported by the committee, and amendments can now be moved.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer, then——

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish the Senator from Indiana would withhold his amendment, so as to give me an opportunity to explain the bill, for I think I can give him some reasons why the amendment he proposes should not be offered.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator from New Jersey will at the same time give us a reason for inserting the lines from 52 to 62, on page 3, when there seems to be a sufficient provision covering that point upon page 2, from line 17 to line 24, I shall be glad. If the confinement is limited to twenty-eight consecutive hours, I cannot see the necessity or the propriety of these two provisos. Perhaps, however, they are right; but it seems to me the whole case is covered by restricting the continuous confinement to twenty-eight hours, as is done on page 2. If the Senator will explain that, I shall be glad.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will answer all questions at the proper time, and if I am permitted to go on now I think I can give good reasons why that clause should be in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, the bill now under consideration is one of the most important which has been brought to the attention of the Senate since I have been honored with a seat in this body. It has a twofold object: first, to prevent cruelty in transportation; and secondly, secure good and healthful meat food to the people. I can conceive of no object more meritorious, or more seriously demanding the attention of Congress. It is not the first time Congress has attempted to correct the evils attendant upon live-stock transportation by remedial legislation. An act to which the present bill is amendatory was passed by Congress, and approved March 3, 1873, and is operative so far as its loose and faulty construction will permit it to be.

The present bill seeks to remedy those defects in the existing law which experience proves to be necessary to the successful accomplishment of the objects and purposes it had in view. The subject under consideration is one which has claimed the attention of the public for many years and petition after petition has been sent here praying for relief. State and national, even international, conventions have been called to consider some suitable remedy for this crying evil, and have memorialized Congress in the resolutions they passed and sent here. It is needless for me to inform the Senate, and particularly the committee especially charged with the consideration of this and other bills having a like object, that this bill is far less restrictive than many others which have been strongly recommended and defended by the public. In short, in the estimation of many people (among whom I may be classed) who have given this subject great attention, it comes far short of being a legal remedy for the evils complained of, but a vast improvement upon the existing law. It also comes before us in the nature of a compromise with the railroad interests, which have heretofore successfully resisted the enforcement of the present and the enactment of more stringent laws. That it is so accepted alike by the large shippers and dealers in live stock, and the transportation interests of the country, justifies the belief that reforms contemplated and required by the terms of this bill will be promptly made.

It is a law demanded by growth of public opinion consequent upon the observation of a condition of circumstances requiring it; and if passed by Congress public opinion will compel its enforcement. It may be observed that, as the railroads over which animals are conveyed to market are interstate railroads, if any cruelty is practiced on animals in transit, Congress has the right to so legislate as to prevent it. And if owing to existing usage of animals on interstate railroads their meat is rendered unwholesome for food, Congress is the only power that can redress the grievance. Let it be remembered that the live-stock interest is one of the most extensive in the country, and from it the United States receive nearly one-third of the amount paid by foreign countries for exported articles, and it also constitutes the principal food of the people of this country, both rich and poor. The time is not far gone when any person who would suggest the idea, much less attempt the experiment, of furnishing the tables of Great Britain with fresh meats direct from American pastures would be considered a fit subject for a lunatic asylum. Although less than two years have elapsed since the first experiment was tried, scarcely a steamer now crosses the Atlantic whose cargo does not consist largely of this product, and in many cases it constitutes the entire cargo. American enterprise and ingenuity have overcome and removed all the obstacles which confronted the successful transit of this extensive and important article of export, and American persistency and skill has at last overcome the absurd prejudice which for a long time met us at the door of every beef-eating Englishman.

Modern methods and appliances have practically bridged the Atlantic, and across that bridge we are now pouring the products of this newly discovered industry. From nothing this industry has in the space of two short years increased to tens of millions, and in the near future can only be measured by hundreds of millions of dollars. With a country like ours, almost unlimited in area and power of production, where the labor of one man upon a soil inexhaustible in fertility can produce as much as thousands can consume, it becomes a matter of vast moment. What shall become of the surplus? In respect to the live-stock industry, the answer is easy. With cheap land and cheap labor—both of which we have in abundance—to represent the cost of production; with cheap transportation—which we should have in a land covered with railroads and water routes—to reach the consumer, the demand for our product in the foreign market—because afforded at low prices—would be practically without limit. The amount received from the sale of our breadstuffs exported only equals that received for our-live stock products; and the latter industry has never received a tithe of the attention given to the former.

The production and sale of grain is seldom attended with profit to the producer, never to the country; while the production of live stock and manufacture of animal products is the most remunerative branch of agriculture, and is always accompanied with increased fertility of the soil. The conditions which impede and govern this production of live stock in Europe shows that this export trade must continue and, with wise and judicious management on our part, vastly increase. While this demand will be beneficial to the American stock grower, it is evident that the industry must be free from unnecessary tribute. With five thousand miles separating the producer from the consumer, we must enforce reforms and adopt habits in transportation which will tend to secure and preserve the health of the animal, thereby securing good, healthful meat, food for consumers at home and abroad, and also suffer the least possible depreciation in the quantity or quality of the meat. That laws should be required to accomplish this end seems to be strange; but the fact is no less apparent. Conceding to Congress, as I have done, the power to make these laws, therefore it can scarcely be said the action of Congress should not be invoked in behalf of healthful food, more especially as the laws passed by the several States for the correction of this evil, being limited in jurisdiction, cannot secure the needed reforms. I think I speak correctly when I say that nearly all the States over whose territory the great live-stock transporting lines are laid have enacted restrictive laws, differing in detail, but agreeing in this important particular, that they prohibit, under heavy penalties, the confinement, without food and water, of animals in transportation for a longer period than a fixed number of hours, the time specified in the Massachusetts law being twenty-eight hours, and in some of the Middle and Western States, if I am not in error, twenty-four hours. I think the law in the State of Indiana, to which the Senator from that State has referred, limits the time to twenty-four hours.

Better legislation for the purpose than this it is probably not in the power of any State to enact. And it was within the power of the State to enforce obedience to the law so long as the place of shipment and point of destination were both within the jurisdiction of the State. But how can the Legislature of any one of a number of States remedy wrongs covering the territory of all of them. Let us take an example. We will suppose the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania prohibited, as I have said, the confinement of animals in cars without food and water for a longer period than twenty-four hours; but remember either of these States is traversed in the ordinary running time of live-stock trains crossing them in, say, eighteen or twenty hours, so that it was actually possible to starve and torture a train of cattle all the way from the Mississippi to the seaboard without violating the letter of a single State law along the entire line. What is evidently required, therefore, is a single, coherent, and comprehensive law by Congress, acting under authority of that clause of the Constitution which invests Congress with the control of commerce among the several States. The State of Ohio on the one side, and the State of New York on the other, have each passed laws regulating within their respective territories the transportation of animals; and yet, as the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, which geographically intervene between the two separate States named, not having any interest in the subject, have made no law thereon, the commerce between these two first-named States is impaired and the animals sent from the one to the other arrive at the terminus injured in market value by acts done while in transit and without the territory of either such State.

Now, it was to cover just such a case as this that the clause was inserted in the Constitution which is here invoked in aid of this bill. Please observe that the bill under consideration neither impairs nor interferes with the right of individual States to provide also against evils aimed at by its provisions. The regulations prescribed by this bill affect no locality, but simply the mode of transit between States of property which is the subject of commerce. This bill aims to establish a general and uniform rule of law regulating the passage of property from one State through another State to a third State. The intervening State has no interest in the subject of the commerce, and is affected only by the mere fact of passage over its territory, and consequently has no interest in regulating the mode of preserving the property while in transit.

To regulate—

Says the Supreme Court of the United States—is to prescribe rules in conformity with which navigation must be carried on. It extends to the persons who conduct it as well as the instruments used. (Cooley vs. The Board of Wardens, 12 Howard, U. S. R., 299.)

"Commerce" said Chief-Justice Marshall, (Gibbons vs. Ogden 9 Wheaton R. 189,) "includes not only traffic, or the interchange of commodities, but navigation, or the transit of goods from one country to another."

The United States circuit court, (per Justice Miller,) in a recent case which arose in Iowa, after reiterating this decision, and reviewing a uniform current of authorities in which it had been followed by the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

"In these cases the judges have been speaking of navigation. But the terms of the Constitution are not confined to that mode of conducting commerce. Any other means of commerce are obviously within its terms and the language of the extracts above given either distinctly state or clearly import such fact. I have shown that railways are now means of interstate commerce as well as steamboats. Their iron tracks, extending from ocean to ocean, are no more limited by political boundaries than are the rivers which rise in one State and flow through others to the sea. Over the former, propelled by one application of the motive power of steam, roll many cars laden with the products and fabrics of one section of the country for the supply of the wants of a distant section. Through the latter, propelled by another application of the same power, ply the steamers laden in like manner and discharging a like beneficent office. Where lies the difference between them? Why should not the power which regulates one extend to the control of the other?" (The Clinton Bridge case, 1 Woolworth, C. C. R.)

Story says:

The regulation of commerce with a view to encourage domestic agriculture is just as important and just as vital to the interests of the nation, and just as much an application of the power as the protection and encouragement of manufactures. It would be strange, indeed, if the people of the United States had been solicitous solely to advance and encourage commerce with a total disregard of the interests of agriculture and manufactures, which had at the adoption of the Constitution an unequivocal preponderance throughout the Union. It is manifest from contemporaneous documents that one object of the Constitution was to encourage agriculture and manufactures by the very use of the power.

Persons raising live stock for sale in other States are certainly encouraged in so doing by the certainty such animals will be delivered in good condition at the place of sale and consumption, and a large pecuniary profit realized thereby. This bill, then, practically encourages agriculture.

Railroads have been judicially held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a vehicle of commerce and transportation, thereby to be equally the subject of commercial regulation as that accomplished by boats and vessels. (State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wallace, U. S. R., 232.)

As was observed by the learned judge in a case already cited, (Clinton Bridge case, 1 Woolworth, C. C. R., 161:) "The shackles with which the different States fettered commerce in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present Constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the Federal Government has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of it to the control of the States through whose territories it must be conducted, and to all the vexations and burdens which they may impose? And must all this be permitted because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the Constitution was framed? For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of any of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it."

"If," says Farrar, (on the Constitution, section 355,) "in the opinion of Congress, the common defense, or general welfare, or the security of liberty should be found to require their interference in regard to any traffic or other intercourse among inhabitants of the States with each other, or anybody else, it would be exceedingly difficult to exclude the jurisdiction of the United States, or to establish any exclusive right thereto in any particular State."

I have somewhere heard it stated that this bill contemplated the establishment of police regulations, and that was entirely without warrant in the Constitution. Even if this bill should so provide—all of which I deny—I think the constitutional power to do so is well stated by a distinguished authority. I refer to Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 586. He says:

Congress may establish police regulations as well as the States, confining their operation to the subjects over which it is given control by the Constitution. But as the general police power can better be exercised under the supervision of the local authority, and mischiefs are not likely to spring therefrom so long as the power to arrest collision resides in the national courts, the regulations which are made by Congress do not often exclude the establishment of others by the State, covering very many particulars. Moreover, the regulations of commerce are usually, and in some cases must be, general and uniform for the whole country; while in some localities State and local policy will demand peculiar regulations with reference to special and peculiar circumstances.

I need not occupy the time of the Senate in calling the attention of its legal minds longer to this branch of the subject, for you understand the constitutional possibilities of the case far better than I do, and will only invite your attention further in this respect to the very able report of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] on transportation routes to the seaboard, and the equally able report (made recently) by Hon. Mr. REAGAN, of Texas, from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, on a bill to regulate the internal commerce of the country. The vast array of decisions and authorities cited in those reports will, I think, convince the most skeptical as to the constitutionality of this proposed legislation. If, therefore, Congress has the power (and the duty and responsibility follow) to regulate commerce as to inanimate property, how more certainly does it become the duty of Congress to enact laws regulating the care of animals, equally the subject of property, and necessary to the good health of the entire community.

As I have already said, the first and primal object of this bill was to prevent cruelty in transportation, from which all other evils flow. If cruelty is not practiced, then no apparent necessity exists for this proposed legislation. If cruelty is practiced, (which I think the facts will show,) then the delay on the part of Congress to make remedial legislation approaches criminality. Now, what are the facts? In order that the Senate may be fully advised in respect to my own knowledge of the truthfulness of the reports and statements I intend to read to you, I wish to premise by saying that, with an experience and opportunity for observation second to none in this country, I declare the live-stock traffic of the country is one long, uninterrupted line of suffering from the West to the East. If the people could have but a glimpse of the scenes which I have witnessed, they would loudly demand of Congress a law so stringent that the repetition of such horrors would be impossible. Millions of tortured brutes which cannot defend themselves and thousands of consumers of diseased flesh are calling loudly for protection at our hands.

Now let me give you some of the facts. George T. Angell, esq., of Boston, president of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, said before the American Social Science Association, in 1874, as follows:

First. That our eastern markets in both cities and towns are largely supplied with the meats of diseased animals, and, to some extent, with the meats of animals that have died of disease;

Second. That the eating of these meats produces disease in those who eat them; and

Third. That it is impossible to detect these meats after they have been dressed and put into the stalls.

It is estimated that about 6 per cent. of cattle and about 9 per cent. of sheep and swine—nearly 600,000 in all—annually die on the passage to market from the West, and a large portion of these are sold in our markets, either as meat or rendered into cooking-lard; while the cattle that get through alive, for the want of food and water and by reason of the cruelty inflicted upon them, after losing on the average in transportation nearly a hundred pounds each in weight from the most juicy and nutritious parts of the meats, come out of the cars full of fever, and many with bruises, sores, and ulcers; and these, together with smaller animals to which the loss and suffering is in proportion equally great, are all sold in our markets for food.

The superintendent of the Allegheny County Humane Society, in his report in 1875, says:

The official reports show that between three and four thousand dead animals were taken from the cars of one of the trunk lines controlled by one company during the last year.

If this is true, how many thousand were there on all the railroads? He further says that the law of Congress on the subject of live-stock transportation is being generally disregarded; that very many of the cattle are kept from three to five days in the cars without food or water until they become diseased and are in a highly feverish condition—actually being carried from Chicago to New York, requiring at least about five days' time, without food or water.

In a statement by the Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, for the year 1874, it is said one thousand five hundred dead animals arrived from Chicago in a single train, in the early part of May last, having died upon the passage. This was an extraordinary and exceptional case occasioned by a sudden change of weather. The statement further says, a bountiful supply of water during transit would have saved the lives of most if not all of these animals. The same authority says further:

Since Congress passed the act of 1872, there have been numerous instances of cattle and hogs crowded into cars as closely as they could stand and carried through from Chicago to New York before unloading; and at other times cars have been unloaded in Pittsburgh, and soon after reloaded in other cars and run through to Philadelphia or New York, thus confined in cars from four to six days without food or water; (only nominally in Pittsburgh;) and the official reports show that between three and four thousand dead animals were taken from the two stations on one of the trunk-lines controlled by one company between Chicago and Philadelphia in the ten months following the passage of the law of Congress, besides the thousands that had their horns broken off, limbs broken, and were trampled upon and bruised in a barbarous manner, and really not in a healthy condition for human food. If so, how many thousands were in the same condition on all the railroads of the Union? Railroad companies should be compelled to provide good, dry pens for feeding and watering live stock in a good and sufficient manner, at least once in eighteen hours on long journeys, and not to exceed twenty-four hours on shorter distances, in order to keep the animals in a sound, healthy condition; humanity and the health of the millions of people using them for food require it to be done, and there is no good and sufficient reason why it should not be done; or else provide cars in which they can be fed and watered sufficiently while in transit.

The Harrisburgh Telegraph says:

"The fearful cruelty to animals in transit over railroads should be a matter of thorough investigation; the neglect of proper feeding and care of animals is so atrocious in its character that the criminality should be exposed, and the guilty made to suffer for their cruelty." It is known that cattle are transported from the West that are confined in cars from two to three days and nights, and at times from four to five days, without rest, food, or water, and if any one lies down for rest the custodian, with a sharp pinion one inch or more in length fastened in the end of a pole, thrusts into the most tender parts of the animal again and again to cause him to rise if possible. Many of them become so exhausted they cannot get up and are trampled upon by their fellows, even to death in many cases, or injured so that they never can stand on their feet again, and are hauled out of the cars after arriving at their destination, and a class of butchers buy them at a mere nominal price and dress them for sale in the market for human food. There were more than three thousand dead animals taken from the cars of one of the lines controlled by one company in the State of Pennsylvania in one year, besides the thousands that had broken horns, broken limbs, and had been trampled upon in a barbarous manner. We have seen cattle taken from cars and put into pens where the mud was from six to twelve inches deep, and they were so extremely thirsty they drank the filthy water standing in the tracks of their former occupants; and from there soon reloaded again, many of them gored, bruised, and so stiff they could hardly walk, and were so fevered their eyes were blood-shotten from pain.

The Chicago Stock Reporter says: "There is great cruelty in transportation. Cars are terribly overcrowded and animals are carried great distances without food or water. The result is, that they are taken out at Chicago, with bruises and sores, and legs and horns broken; many of them dead, and more almost dead; and sometimes cattle and hogs, and sometimes cattle and sheep, are packed in the same car, which results in the smaller animals being trampled upon by the larger."

There are more than one hundred millions of animals killed in the Union of States yearly for human food, a large portion of which are confined in cars while in transit, without food or water from two to four days at a time, and become in a highly fevered condition before they are slaughtered for the market.

Let me now read (even at the risk of shocking senatorial stomachs, which, if common report be true, are generally strong) the report of the cattle inspector of the city of Buffalo, made in and for the month of February last, and will be found in the very able report of Hon. A. M. Cutler, from the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, in May last:

[Buffalo Sunday News.]

From Chicago to the seaboard without water or food—Facts from the report of the cattle inspector at Buffalo—Over two thousand dead and crippled in one month—Feverish meat.

The report of the cattle-inspector for the month of February was presented to the council by the city clerk on Monday last. It contains figures showing the number of dead and crippled stock received at the Buffalo yards during the month the report covers. It is a matter that is not often brought to the notice of the public, and yet there are facts in it with which the people should be acquainted, and which will be very interesting, though perhaps not so easy or pleasant to digest.

Of dead cattle there were received 25; of dead sheep, 304; and of dead hogs, 718. Of crippled cattle there were 26; of crippled sheep, 197; and of crippled hogs, 926; making in all, 1,077 dead animals and 1,149 crippled ones.

There are but two ways by which the meat of sick and crippled stock can be put into the market for table use. One way is by corrupting the cattle inspector, bribing him to pass the stock as all right, and the other by the selling of the meat to the retail dealers by those who make a business of buying dead, sick, and crippled stock after it has been condemned.

The reporter made a patient inquiry among the knowing ones about the stock-yards, but could not find anything from which to conclude, or even surmise, that the inspectors have intentionally and directly allowed affected or improper meat to get into the local market.

One man said, "The cattle inspector has a chance to make a snap out of this business, if he wants to."

"How?" asked the reporter.

"By pronouncing stock that should be condemned as all right."

"Do you think this is practiced to any extent?"

"Well, now, you must not ask me such a question. I would not like to answer it either way. The present cattle inspector would be able to tell you how the business is managed."

The reporter found the inspector at his residence on Stanton street.

The reporter said, "I would like to get a little insight into the way the cattle inspector does his work."

"Well," he said, "my duties are to inspect all the stock that comes in, and condemn all such animals as are not in a healthy condition or fit to be turned into meat for the market."

"Does the entire responsibility rest with you to see that condemned stock is not dressed and put in the market for the public use?"

"I suppose so, as far as I can prevent it."

"What is done with the dead stock received?"

"I consign it to the bone-yard."

"Does it all go there?"

"I think so. I either see to it myself or send some one to see that they are taken there."

"What use are they put to?"

"The cattle are skinned and the carcasses and bones manufactured into fertilizers."

"What does a dead steer bring?"

"A large fat one will sell for $10."

"Are the dead and crippled hogs sent to the bone-yard as well?"

"Some of the crippled hogs are as good for the market as sound ones. It does not hurt the meat."

"What becomes of the dead ones?"

"They are thrown into big tanks and rendered into lard."

"Are they cleaned before tanking?"

"No; they are thrown in as they come from the cars."

"Is the fat obtained used for making soap?"

"No, sir. Thus the lard runs out as clear as that manufactured from the leaf."

"Don't it smell bad?"

"No. They use some chemical to deodorize it, so that it is perfectly sweet."

"Is this lard used for cooking purposes?"

"Of course it is."

"Is it sold in the local markets?"

"Some of it is, I presume; but I believe the bulk is shipped to England."

"And sold as the genuine home-made article, is it not?"

"No doubt."

"What do these dead and badly-crippled hogs bring?"

"From two and a half to —— cents per pound."

"Do any of the Buffalo retail meat-dealers buy this kind of stock?"

"Yes; some of them come and pick it up when they can."

"What do they do with it?"

"I don't know."

"How do you find the stock as it comes in from the cars?"

"You may suppose how it comes in. It is a shame and an outrage. The stock is loaded at Chicago and carried to Buffalo without food or water."

"How long does it take to bring them from Chicago?"

"About thirty-eight hours, if there is no delay."

"And they get nothing to eat or drink by the way?"

"Nothing; and——"

"And what?"

"And, I was going to say, what is worse, some of the stock is left in the yards here for three hours without food or water, and then reloaded and shipped to New York."

The testimony given orally before the committee in respect to live stock transportation at the present time strongly corroborates the foregoing statements.

It is on account of just such practices as this that the humane societies of the country have taken hold of this matter and a national humane society was formed, which had its first meeting in Cleveland on the 9th day of October, 1877. Representatives from all the different State societies all over the country were there in attendance, and I would like to read the preamble and series of resolutions passed by that humane society:

Whereas the humane societies here assembled and represented, deprecating the shocking barbarities now inflicted upon animals in transit—in one instance more than three thousand dead animals having been taken from the cars of a railroad line controlled by one company in a single year, besides other thousands that had limbs and horns broken, or had been trampled upon to their terrible injury:

1. Resolved, That these societies declare themselves now organized for the purpose of continuous effort, by all lawful means, until this inhumanity has ceased.

2. Resolved, That as an additional incentive for action on the part of the societies here represented we would adduce the injurious effects to human beings from the consumption of the fevered and diseased flesh of animals undergoing such cruel treatment; the boards of health in many of the cities of the United States having declared it to be their opinion that a large percentage of the sickness and premature death in the community is due to this cause.

3. Resolved, That the laws hitherto passed by Congress, and also by many of the States, have proved insufficient for the protection of animals in transit on railroads and steamboats.

4. Resolved, That Congress and the Legislatures of the respective States be, and they are hereby, most earnestly entreated to enact such laws as will effectually prevent the ill-treatment of animals in transit.

5. Resolved, That the officers of the different railroad and transportation lines be earnestly requested to co-operate with this organization in its efforts to ameliorate the condition of the animals while on their respective lines, and that all shippers and receivers of stock be also requested to co-operate with us in this humane effort.

I will cite only one more report on this phase of the question. I will read a portion of the report of the New York cattle commissioners in their report to the Legislature of that State in 1869, and I venture the assertion that the same conditions now exist, only in a more aggravated form. They say:

Under the most favorable circumstances and conditions of treatment, stock shipped from the West by railway endure such suffering and torture as would of necessity destroy the lives of human beings placed under similar treatment. Any one who has been compelled to stand for half an hour in a straggling, surging crowd of men, pressed, whirled and crushed in its eddies, without power to extricate themselves, may imagine the sufferings and conditions of the cattle in a loaded car, as they are jammed together and jerked over our railways. Lengthen out this misery for an hour or two and it becomes intolerable, but continue it for hours—a whole day together with a long night—and only the strongest natures could survive the treatment. During this twenty-four hours of agony they are without a morsel of food or a drop of water. A broiling sun may be pouring its rays down until the air seems stifling and suffocating. Their agonized fellows, frantic with misery, press and surge against them in endeavoring to gain relief from the horrid pressure, and the horns, whether they will or not, wound and tear and score each other in the crowd, to which suffering is added the inevitable goad of the attendant, necessary, yes, absolutely necessary, to prevent the trampling to death of some of the number.

At the end of the twenty-four hours they are sometimes removed, and their feverish thirst is slaked by large draughts of water, and they lie down to rest, eating but little, for they are positively sick. Off the cars for twenty or twenty-four hours—just long enough for their punctured wounds to fester and their injured frames to become sore and stiff—when they must be reloaded to pass through another twenty hours of the same agony, only aggravated by the wounds and soreness of the bruises they have before received; and so, day after day, for five, ten, or fifteen days, they live and suffer on their passage to the market.

Although it is to be hoped that the several States west and south of us will do their whole duty in the matter of enacting such laws regulating the stock trade and transportation as may be needful within their own boundaries, the State of New York should, irrespective of their action, do its whole duty to itself and people. Our population is rapidly increasing. We must receive the bulk of our meats from the West. It is indispensable to the health of that population that these meats should be wholesome and of good quality. It is an imperative duty, so far as the law-making power is concerned, to render them as much so as possible, and the commissioners would fail in a grave and solemn duty did they not present all the facts and circumstances to the consideration of the Legislature.

If any additional testimony were needed to convince the Senate that great cruelties are practiced in live-stock transportation it might be supplied indefinitely. The President of the United States, with great force and propriety, in his last message to Congress calls the attention of Congress to this more than evil.

Let us now turn to the second inquiry. Is the flesh of animals under such conditions healthful? Upon this subject I am not a competent authority, but I refer you with some degree of confidence to the testimony of those whose statements would be accepted on almost any other question of sanitary importance. I will now read you a statement from George T. Angell, of Boston, president of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, before the American Social Science Association, in 1874. The Senators from that State can speak for him as to character and qualifications. He proceeds to say:

On the 17th of April, 1871, George E. Temple, a Brighton butcher, died, as appears from the verdict of the coroner's jury, of "blood poison, inoculated in dressing for market a dead ox, one-half of the meat of which was sent into Boston for sale." On the 20th of April a joint special committee of the aldermen and common council of Boston was appointed "to ascertain whether unwholesome meats were sold in that city."

Five months afterward the report of that committee containing the official reports and testimony of State cattle commissioners, boards of health, and physicians was published by the city government. By this report and the various official reports and evidence therein cited and contained, as well as by other official reports and evidence more recently published, it appears—

First. That our eastern markets in both cities and towns are largely supplied with the meats of diseased animals, and to some extent with the meats of animals that have died of disease;

Second. That the eating of these meats produces disease in those who eat them; and

Third. That it is impossible to detect these meats after they have been dressed and put into the stalls.

It is estimated that about 6 per cent. of cattle and about 9 per cent. of sheep and swine, nearly six hundred thousand in all, annually die on the passage to market from the West, and a large portion of these are sold in our markets either as meat or rendered into cooking-lard, while the cattle that get through alive, for the want of food and water and by reason of the cruelty inflicted upon them, after losing on the average in transportation nearly a hundred pounds each in weight from the most juicy and nutritious parts of the meat, come out of the cars full of fever and many with bruises, sores, and ulcers; and these, together with smaller animals, to which the loss and suffering are in proportion equally great, are all sold in our markets for food.

The board of health of Chicago, in February, 1871, reported that "nearly one-half the beef, pork, and mutton offered for sale in that city was diseased and unfit for food."

The cattle commissioners of New York, in their report of 1869, say: "It became apparent to the metropolitan board of health in New York City that the alarming increase of obstinate and fatal diarrhœa in the metropolitan district was caused by the use of diseased meats;" and they add that "not only do western cattle lose a hundred pounds or more per head in transportation, but the tissues of their entire systems are turned into a feeble, disordered, and feverish condition."

The Massachusetts railroad commissioners, in their report of 1871, say that these meats, tainted in transportation, endanger the health of our people.

Professor Agassiz says: "Let me call your attention to the dangers arising from the ill-treatment of beef-cattle before slaughtering them."

Medical Inspector Hamlin, in his Notes on the Alimentation of Armies, says: "The flesh of mammalia undergoes great change by reason of fasting, disturbance of sleep, and long-continued suffering, resulting in its not only becoming worthless, but deleterious."

Can these meats be detected in the markets? Professor Cameron, of Dublin, says that "the flesh of oxen in the congestive stage of pleuro-pneumonia cannot be distinguished from that of healthy oxen."

In 1866, it was found in New York that hogs were killed by feeding upon the blood and entrails of animals diseased by transportation, although they will fatten on the same material taken from healthy animals. Professor Granger states, in the Edinburgh Review of May, 1863, that—

He had known cattle diseased by cruelty in transportation, the beef of which had the appearance of being the best beef that a butcher can show; and yet pigs, dogs, and ferrets died from eating it, and horses died from drinking water into which the blood of one of them had run.

Dr. Thomas R. Varick, surgeon-general of New Jersey, a most competent authority, says:

To starve and fatigue cattle to the extent I am credibly informed is now practiced vitiates digestion and causes dryness and irritation of the mucous membrane. It lessens pulmonary evaporation and induces a condition of fever. According to Fordyce, an eminent medical writer, a fever is a disease which affects the whole system. It affects the head, the trunk, and the extremities; it affects the circulation, the absorption, and the nervous system; it affects the skin, muscular fibers, and membrane. It is, therefore, a disease of the whole system in every form and sense.

It is safe to assume that scarcely a pound of meat is consumed in the eastern cities that is entirely free from these conditions; conditions depending largely upon the cruelties inflicted in transit.

Dr. William A. Hammond, of New York, formerly Surgeon-General of the United States Army, and one of the most distinguished physicians in this or any other country, says:

It is well established that the flesh of animals which have recently undergone long continued physical suffering is not suitable for human food; indeed it is often distinctively poisonous.

In a paper by Dr. Hammond, published in the Bellevue and Charity Hospital Reports for 1870, page 380, he wrote as follows:

The influence of bodily suffering in rendering the flesh of animals poisonous is very clearly shown in the following account by Dr. Rosser: "In order to procure a roast for Easter day a gentleman desired his family to set a snare for a roebuck. Accordingly one of these poor animals was caught in the snare, which, as its head and breast had passed through, held it by the hinder parts of the body, the abdomen and pelvis being inclosed in the cord, so that it must have succumbed after a most agonizing struggle. It was found dead next day. The master and mistress of the house ate on Easter day the best part of this dainty; the servants had but little; the remainder was laid in vinegar, but not eaten. On the same day all the family who had eaten of the venison observed a sticky dryness of the mouth, oppression of the stomach, and nausea. All complained of oppression of the head, giddiness, and great weariness of the limbs. The master lost his sight for several days, and, in short, there now began a series of remarkable symptoms, requiring in many cases the assistance of Dr. Roser. The husband was only restored to health in July, but the wife never recovered. She lingered more than two years and at last died. The daughter and the man and maid servant, who had eaten but little of the tortured animal, were soon cured. The symptoms in many respects resembled those of the bite of rabid animals, and of the saugage-poison of Wurtemberg."

Dr. Rosser concludes his communication as follows:

"Many an animal used as food is tortured to death in the most barbarous manner like the roebuck in the snare. Ought not the medical police to be led by cases like this to adopt the most stringent regulations to prevent the use as food of animals which have in any way been tortured before being slaughtered?"

Dr. Hammond adds:

We see, therefore, that physical suffering per se is capable of poisoning the flesh of animals. I have no doubt many of the obscure cases of food-poisoning and consequent death which are constantly occurring in this and other cities are the direct result of eating the poisoned and insufficiently nourished flesh of animals brought to market in the way you describe. But we ought not and will not disregard the emotions which the dreadful sufferings of the poor beasts awaken in our hearts as constituting another reason why the law should be invoked for their protection.

Dr. John J. J. Craven, one of the most distinguished sanitarians now living, writes:

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to Senate bill No. 84, dated October 22, 1877, introduced by Hon. Mr. Howe, to amend certain provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the transportation of animals, and moved by a sense of duty, first, to the vast consuming public whose homes are far removed from rearing, feeding, and grazing farms; and, secondly, by a feeling of humanity toward the animals transported to the markets and to the seaboard, I address to you this letter. For ten years my home has been near the terminus of one of the most important avenues of cattle, sheep, and hog transportation, and I have made the condition of these animals a careful study, and have frequently called the attention of shippers and carriers to the condition of the animals arriving, and have earnestly urged a reform in the system of carrying, first, as a sanitary measure, and to the very unfit condition of the flesh for human food, arriving, as they often do, in a jaded and starving condition, and hurried to the slaughtering-pen and shambles before they have had sufficient time for rest and a perfect restoration to a normal condition of vital organs.

Many times it occurs that fifty, and indeed a hundred hours are passed between the stages of rest, and unfortunately it is the belated and delayed animals that are hurried to slaughter in order to avoid loss from shrinkage that must invariably occur to animal economy by exposure and deprivation. I have carefully noted the condition of the several organs of the animals while in this state and can assure you that the consequences resulting from this evil must be pernicious.

I am just here reminded that great loss occurs to the immediate consumer, for it is a fact that the flesh of an animal killed while in a fatigued, fevered, or famished condition will not keep even by refrigeration and will not cure properly though most carefully handled and in most favorable conditions of atmosphere. It would be imposing upon your intelligence for me to say how unfit such meat is for food.

And what shall I say for the poor dumb brutes? If I could only plead as earnestly as I feel and as intelligently as their cause demands! These poor creatures are crowded into cars with no intelligence as to motion, affrighted with the start, carried past objects with rapidity, and suddenly stopped, and so on throughout hours and days, the nervous system augmenting the pangs of hunger and thirst, really dying each moment by a continuous "nightmare" of fright. I could tell you of the fevered condition of the blood, of the vitiated condition of the tissues, of the entire suspension of important secretions of animals subjected to such continued exposure. All of this is within the scope of scientific observation. But to realize or describe these sufferings is beyond my power or knowledge.

I think the length of stages named in the bill are reasonable. By the love I bear to these our dumb servants and by the duty I owe to the cause of humanity, I earnestly entreat that you will give it your careful consideration and urge your colleagues to a favorable report of the same.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JOHN J. J. CRAVEN, M. D.,
Jersey City, New Jersey.

From these facts it appears that cruelty to animals avenges itself upon the consumer, and that we shall never be secure against disease from eating poisonous meats until animals are transported without cruelty, as they can be with little loss of weight, greater profit to railroads, and complete protection to public health. That a certain amount of suffering in transportation will occur is very evident, but it may be vastly remedied by a strict observance of the provisions of the proposed bill. Humanity and the health of the people demand it. The English and French governments have already passed stringent laws for the regulation of this traffic, and they are most rigidly enforced.

Mr. Nathan Appleton, of Massachusetts, a delegate from the national society of this country to the International Humane Society, which met at Paris last summer, writes as follows:

Knowing that the transportation of live stock, by land and by water, on the rivers or at sea, was a matter of especial interest to the United States, and that a bill on this subject was now before Congress, I took pains to bring it particularly before the Committee on Legislation, as I was convinced that any action taken by the congress would materially aid us in America in securing the desired legislation from our Congress at Washington, the Legislatures of the States, and the railroad and steamship companies. To this end the following resolution, offered by me, was passed by the congress:

"The Congress expresses the hope that at the next session of the Congress of the United States the bill for the better transportation of animals by railroad in the United States shall become a law."

He also appends citations from the French law:

Article 4 of part II of the Code says: "Every railway car made to transport animals shall be furnished with troughs and cribs to hold the necessary food and water."

Article 5 of part III says: "Railway companies and common carriers shall be responsible for infringements of the law which limits the time of confinement in cars without food and water."

The English law restricts the time of continuous confinement in cars without food and water to twenty consecutive hours. In 1876 a resolution was passed by Parliament instructing a committee of that body, acting in concert with the Royal Humane Society, to examine into and recommend some more humane and perfect system of cattle transportation. Acting under these instructions the committee offered a prize of £400 sterling for the best device for feeding and watering live stock in cars while in transitu, the object being to require their use on all railroads in Great Britain if the experiment should prove satisfactory. The prize was sought for by fifty-six different inventors with as many different devices, and it was awarded to an American invention in use on the railroads in this country, and now the property of the public, as the patents have expired by limitation. Thus it will be seen that our European neighbors, with routes of transportation measured by hundreds while ours are measured by thousands of miles between the producer and the consumer, are far in advance of us in adopting reforms which will add millions to the wealth of this branch of industry. The cattle producer of the States and Territories of the great West, which must hereafter provide meat food for the countless millions of the earth, cannot with profit postpone reforms in transportation which will enable them to compete in the markets of the world.

If science and experience have proven any one theory beyond a doubt or peradventure it is that long-continued deprivation and cruelty inflicted upon animals in transportation is one of the most influential, if not decisive, causes of disease, and on account of it our live animals are now debarred from competition in the English market. Let this embargo continue for a few weeks and the live-stock industries of the great West will receive a shock scarcely felt during times of financial panic. The production of live stock has been so increased and regulated that demand and supply at home and abroad has secured most liberal prices for the product.

It is the opinion of those best competent to judge, that the removal of the surplus product by exportation during the past year has secured to the producer an additional compensation of at least two cents per pound more than would have been received had no export trade been possible. To meet the additional demand thus created, additional sources of supply have been opened, which now furnish a supply far beyond the possibility of our own people to consume. To throw this vast surplus upon the home market would almost bankrupt the producer, while the cheapness of the product would beget a wasteful extravagance on the part of the consumers entirely inconsistent with the economy demanded by the circumstances of the times and without benefit even to them.

It is further charged (and with great propriety) by our foreign consumers that we cannot supply them with healthful meat food so long as the extreme cruelties now practiced in transportation are permitted to continue. In proof thereof we are cited to the testimony of our State, national, and international humane societies, which testimony cannot be gainsaid or resisted, respecting the inhuman treatment of animals on our long routes of transportation to the seaboard, and express surprise that such practices should be tolerated by a people making any pretensions to Christianity. Careful and scientific investigation has fully demonstrated the fact that pleuro-pneumonia or other epidemic disease does not exist in this country except outside a few foul and diseased stables where it has always existed; that the herds of cattle upon our immense prairies from which supplies are drawn to feed both home and foreign markets are entirely free from disease.

Investigation and experience have also demonstrated another fact, that when these animals, originally healthy and free from disease, reach the English ports or even our own seaboard they are afflicted with lung disease, a disease which exposure and starvation always produce, and is mild or virulent in proportion to the measure of suffering which produced it. It is folly to say that such an animal is healthy, or while in that condition is fit for human food.

To my own experience and investigation let me also add in this connection the testimony of Inspector Drexler, of Pittsburgh, a very intelligent man, and who has evidently given this subject close attention. I read his reply to certain questions propounded by the reporter of the Pittsburgh Commercial newspaper:

"What do you think of the cattle-plague bill which has just passed the house?" said a reporter yesterday to Meat Inspector Drexler, of Allegheny.

"I see," was the reply, "that the fellows at Harrisburgh are tinkering with the subject. Their bill is good enough so far as it goes, but I think this whole matter has been exaggerated, and the right remedy will never be reached until we change our methods of transportation."

"How's that; don't you think there is any disease among the cattle?"

"Oh, yes, I do; but I don't think it has been half as widely extended as they say. In my rounds in this city I have not found anything to alarm me. This is not a new disease, either. We have had it in past years, more or less, and always will have it when cattle are not properly handled. It is simply a congestion of the lungs, produced by excitement and ill-treatment. As soon as we remedy these things we will do away with the disease."

"I don't think I understand you. Where does this ill-treatment come in?"

THE ORIGIN OF THE EVIL.

"Well, let me show you from the beginning. Say that most of the cattle are raised in the West for the market. They are generally raised on large farms, are fed regularly three times a day and watered; are treated with all possible kindness, and, as the farms are large, they are usually secluded and never get within the range of anything unusual to excite them. The stock raiser knows that kindness and careful attention will make them thrive, and he acts accordingly. Well, after they are about three or four years old, they are ready for the market. The stock buyer comes along and makes a purchase. The cattle are at once started for the nearest railroad station and shipped for the East. They are hurried along from the time they leave the farm, and, exhausted with the travel and excitement together, they are hustled into a stock car and started on their journey. They are, too, overheated with the excitement and previous travel. The cars are open, nothing but slats inclosing them, and in this state they are whirled through the country. If you stand on a platform of a car and take in the draught, you will appreciate the situation of these cattle. They are standing in a draught nearly all the time, and whirled along through different atmospheres, so that it would be a miracle if they did not "catch cold." Then, too, they are not more than half fed or watered. Now, take a drove and put them through this process until they reach New York, and is it any wonder that they get congestion of the lungs, or pleuro-pneumonia, as they call it?"

"And is that all that the disease is?"

"Yes, sir. It's merely an affection of the lungs, just like consumption in a man, and is produced ninety-nine times out of a hundred in the way I state. I admit that it is hereditary in some instances; but if you trace it back you will find that the cattle originally have been abused, and of course their offspring will inherit the disease; but these causes are rare, and if all cattle were properly treated there would be none of it."

AN OLD DISEASE.

"You say you have heard of this disease before. Are you sure it is the same?"

"I don't think there is any doubt of it. Every butcher will tell you he has seen it in his experience. In my nineteen years as a butcher, and part of the time as meat inspector, I have come across some cases, but there never was such a fuss made about it. The fact is, up to a certain stage the meat is not injured, and many a beef has been put on the market and sold that has had the disease in its incipiency; it does not poison the meat until it reaches the advanced stages, when it goes through the whole system. A man may have a slight cold on his lungs, but that does not say his whole system is poisoned with consumption."

"Well, what would you propose as a remedy in the whole matter?"

"I would propose a change in our mode of transportation. I would compel railroads and shippers to take proper care of cattle—the same as they do of human passengers—by providing cars and not overcrowding them. I think if Congress and our Legislatures would take this matter in hand, and prevent the cruelty to the animals and this barbarous way of rushing cattle into market, it would do more to stamp out the disease and give us plump, healthy cattle than all the sanitary inspectors and boards of health that could be created."

"But, Mr. Drexler, what have you to say about the row they are raising about it in Europe? Are the cattle not diseased?"

"Well, I suppose they are by the time they reach there. Just look at it. From the time they leave the farm until they reach Europe is about thirty days at the least. All that time they are subjected to excitement, to irregular feeding, and to rapid changes of temperature. Now take the heartiest man and see if he can stand a strain like that. I don't wonder some of the cattle are diseased. My only wonder is that they reach Europe alive at all. But, as I say, the evils of our transportation system are at the bottom of the whole trouble. I don't think there is any use of Congress wasting $250,000 for boards of inspection and such things. Let them regulate the transportation. Let cars be used that will let the air in from the top and not from the sides to give a draught; then prohibit the crowding of the cattle into the cars, and make a stringent law that they must be regularly attended to while on the way. Then, too, the cattle when first started from the farm should be driven slowly, not rushed along until the blood boils, and when they are cooled off then let them be loaded on the cars. If these precautions are taken I am sure we will hear less of the cattle disease."

NO DISEASE HERE.

Mr. Drexler continued the conversation in this way, elaborating his ideas at length, and in conclusion, in reply to a question by the reporter as to whether he had found much of the disease here, said:

"No, sir. In my rounds I have only found one beef that I believe was troubled with the complaint. I saw him at the drove-yard on Monday, and of course ordered him to be cared for. It is not here we get it, however, but at the other end of the line, in the East, where the cattle arrive exhausted after their journey, which goes to prove my ideas."

Thus it is that our live cattle have been practically banished from a foreign market; and without needed reforms in transportation (removing the cause) the beef product, now so important an export, will also share the same fate. The people of this country so largely interested can scarcely afford, through any fault of theirs, to permit this new industry to be strangled in its birth. It is only fair, however, to say the fault is not altogether our own. The agricultural interests of Great Britain, largely influential in governmental affairs, have viewed with alarm and discontent the wholesale destruction of a home industry which they thought safe from competition. Unnatural as it would be, considering their theory of government, and perhaps suicidal as a measure of policy, to attempt to levy a tax upon our product, the same result has been accomplished by a more sagacious and crafty, although a less honorable method. An army of unscrupulous inspectors, spies, and informers have been appointed, a system of espionage adopted, rules and regulations, most unjust and restrictive, invented; and by such agents, governed by such rules, prompted and egged on by a potent, competitive home industry, the market value of American beef is fixed and determined. While our beef, if it reaches the English market in good condition, is far superior to their own product, yet the mind of the consumer has been poisoned by the persistent cry of disease. Such an imagination will never permit an English stomach to digest American beef. Therefore, through fear born of misrepresentation, strengthened and made more certain by the testimony of a government inspector, the American product is left without a buyer or friend.

Let the illustration be carried further if you please. Suppose the animal be selected in localities and from herds in this country in which disease among cattle of any nature or character was never even suspected, much less known, slaughtered at our own ports, conveyed across the ocean in refrigerated compartments, (as is now done with great success,) delivered in London certainly in as good if not better condition for the table than when it left our ports; if all this were done, (and as I have said it daily is done,) is it not a full answer to all their demands and a safe and permanent solution of the export question? It must be remembered that beef transported in this or any other mode must be purchased, if purchased at all, by a consumer whose imagination has been poisoned by the insane action, I might almost say conspiracy, of the home and Canadian governments, and he will buy none but English beef.

The English landed proprietor and farmer are both interested in damaging the reputation of our product, whose competition has revolutionized the whole live-stock industry of Great Britain. It is easy for them to publish and natural for the public to believe that whereas disease exists among live cattle imported from this country, the consumer should beware of the beef brought in refrigerators, it being impossible then to detect disease if any existed previous to slaughter; it is therefore a Yankee expedient to market upon them diseased animals, which if imported in a living animal their close inspection would certainly condemn.

So much for the disease. Have we a remedy? In my opinion the remedy will be found only in the enactment of stringent laws and the enforcement of the same, by which the abuses in transportation and consequent disease will be in a great measure prevented, if not entirely checked, and by carefully inspecting all animals, either living or dead, designed for export, such inspector to be appointed under and by authority of national law, and authorized to give a certificate of health for said animals if their condition as to health will so warrant. Armed with said certificate, the animal touches English soil supported and vouched for by an authority which will be recognized and respected, and which will go far toward satisfying and correcting a misdirected public sentiment. If the bill now under consideration enacted into law fails to accomplish all this, it will fall far short of meeting the expectations of its friends.

Mr. BECK. I intimated a little while ago to the Senator from New Jersey that I desired to ask him a question which I hoped he would not fail to discuss before he got through. The people of my State and of many others are greatly interested in the cheap transportation of cattle, and it is the interest of every producer of animals to get them to market in as sound condition as possible. The point I desire the Senator to discuss is whether or not much of the cruel treatment to which the animals are exposed does not grow out of the fact that there are great monopolies in the form of stock-yards and other arrangements where the animals are taken off to feed them and water them? I ask if the charges at these places have not become so great and the burden so onerous that men take all other risks rather than undergo the infliction of the enormous swindle that is imposed upon them, generally by men who compose the railroad organizations and who control the stock-yards and cattle-pens. I should be glad to hear something on that subject, as to how far the great charges imposed in that form have induced men to take the risk of pushing the cattle on to their destination rather than to submit to the enormous payment they would have to make. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's argument; but I should like to hear him on this point.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am very glad the Senator has asked me that question, because I shall be very frank and free in answering it. Although I have but little voice, I shall undertake to make answer to the inquiries any Senator may make respecting this whole subject. The Senator from Kentucky is pleased to call the stock-yard interests a monopoly. I confess that they are a monopoly, and a monopoly from the very nature of the case. These stock-yards are located along the railway lines. They have been constructed by the railroad corporations for the purpose of feeding, watering, and caring for animals committed to their care which have not yet reached the point of destination. Of course it is necessary for the railroad companies to have their own officers and agents to care for the animals and to look after them, because they are interested in their safety. It is quite an uncommon thing to find a competition stock-yard along any of the great lines of cattle transportation. It is uncommon because it requires a large expenditure of money. These places are extensive and expensive. The railroad companies require additional switches, turnouts, tracks, yards, chutes, &c., for the purpose of distribution, and in many cases, of course, these stock-yards would be managed by irresponsible parties. It would not be, perhaps, consistent with good railroading for a railroad corporation to place this matter beyond its own control. Therefore I say from the very necessities of the case they are monopolies in themselves. I ask the honorable Senator if he ever knew a case in his life where a corporation or an individual under such circumstances proved to be a public benefactor in the conduct of his business? But I hope before I close my speech that I shall be able to show the Senator a remedy for all the evils of which he complains. While there is scarcely such a thing possible in the nature of affairs as competition between stock-yards, there is such a thing as competition which will break the back-bone of that monopoly, and it is to that particular competition I wish to address myself, and I think I shall be able to show the Senator from Kentucky that provision is made in this proposed bill for all the evils of which he complains.

I will now proceed to show the nature and extent of the proposed amendments to the law, and I will answer the Senator from Kentucky, as I intended to speak upon this particular phase of the question before I got through, even if I had not been asked the question. No change worthy of notice is proposed in the first and second sections. It will be remembered that this bill simply proposes to amend the Revised Statutes, and some of the sections are left almost as they are found in the existing law. In the third section a radical change is proposed by adding a proviso not found in the existing law, requiring all railroad companies to give cars loaded with live stock the right of way over all trains except passenger trains. This is a most wise and salutary provision for this reason: The railroad corporations generally manage their business in a way most profitable to themselves. If a coal train, an iron train, or a train of cars filled with inanimate freight should lie upon the track in the way of the rapid transit of a stock train, unless forced to do it by some restrictive law they perhaps would not be willing to take the trouble and the expense of getting that train out of the way to enable the live-stock train to reach the market or the feeding point in the least possible time. Railroads pretend to do this thing now, but it is more with them at present a matter of convenience than of strict policy.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. By the Senator's permission, I should like to ask him where he gets the authority of Congress to regulate railroad trains, and to provide that one train shall have preference over another, and to say how the trains shall be run? Where does the authority come from to say that the Government of the United States can in any way regulate a railroad train and the manner in which it is run?

Mr. McPHERSON. Under the power to regulate commerce among the States.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend knows that there are some very long roads, the New York Central, for instance, that run in but one State.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is very true, and this measure is not intended to apply to a railroad company where both the points of shipment and of destination are within a single State. Almost every one of the States has local laws for the correction of this evil; but so far as it applies to interstate commerce, to those long lines of communication between the East and West, from the great prairies of the West where the live stock is raised to the Eastern States, the bill does regulate the transportation. But to answer the Senator's question, let me say in reply, that the States of Illinois and Ohio for instance are separated by the State of Indiana. I wish to know if it is not proper for the Congress of the United States to so legislate as to prevent the injury to my property or the property of any citizen in passing through the State of Indiana on those interstate railroads by allowing that property to remain along the line of road upon a side track or upon switches for a sufficient length of time to impair its value? I think we have as much authority under that clause of the Constitution to legislate in this particular as in any other particular affecting commerce between the States.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If I do not interrupt the Senator I will ask him whether Congress has ever exercised the power to control a railroad at any time in the history of this Government?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair.) Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. McPHERSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I asked the question because the Senator signified that it would be agreeable to him.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator asks if we have any right at all to control the railroad corporations of the country and require them to care for animals and feed and water them? Have we not just as much right to say to them that they shall give this animate property, a peculiar species of property subject to decay and loss, a right of way over inanimate property that is not subject to decay and loss?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But I ask the Senator where such a policy would stop? If we have a right to regulate a cattle train, we have a right to regulate a coal train, and it would lead us to assert that Congress has the same power to regulate a railroad in all particulars as to regulate it in one particular.

Mr. HEREFORD. To regulate the speed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course. My colleague well suggests that we could regulate the speed of trains and regulate them in any other way, even to regulate who should be employed by a railroad company.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not think the Senator could carry it so far.

As to the propriety of this change a variety of opinions exist, but, it having commended itself to the judgment of the committee, I will not oppose it, although I prefer the existing law. All other parts of this section accord substantially with the original law, but there is contained in this section of the amendments and also in the law we seek to amend a proviso greatly misunderstood and of which the Senator wishes me to speak. I suppose there is not a Senator upon this floor who has not heard more or less about the so-called patent palace stock-car, and having heard but one side of the question, and that side not interested for the public, but for themselves, you have learned to regard it as an enemy to our civilization. I can think of no one more entitled to the favor of a patent than that inventive genius who has or can devise a car that will prevent suffering to animals in transit, secure good meat food, and save to the producer all the profits he now pays to the feeding stations along the routes of transportation—in short, breaks the backbone of the stock-yard monopoly of which the Senator complains.

Let me illustrate: The State of Iowa is one of the great cattle and corn producing States of the West. The cost of producing corn in some localities in that State I suppose is not more than ten cents per bushel. Cattle and corn, therefore, raised upon the same farm and representing the lowest possible cost go into the car together, the corn being distributed daily to the cattle in troughs provided for the purpose, while water is furnished without cost as often as the animals require it, and that, too, while the train is in motion. Now let the Senator from Kentucky compute the difference between corn costing ten cents per bushel—placed in cars—to the producer, and that costing fifteen times ten cents, the price charged by nearly all the stock-yards in the country, and what is the answer? I think it takes about eight days to transport a train of cattle from Iowa to the New York market. If the Senator should fail to give each animal at least two bushels of corn, or its equivalent in other feed, during the eight days' journey he would feel like accusing himself of cruelty. Now, if you please, continue and complete the computation you commenced, and multiply the difference in the cost of food for one animal by the entire product of that State not needed for home consumption, then tell me what the people of Iowa would gain by the defeat of this or any other bill which enabled them to exercise the option of supplying their own cattle with feed at low rates, or submit to any imposition the present stock-yard monopoly may impose. Nor is this all. Ask any common-sense man in that State or out of it if it is not an advantage, both in quantity and quality of the animal, when suffering is prevented and great depreciation and deterioration—always attendant upon suffering—avoided, as it will be by properly feeding, watering, and caring for the animal in transit.

It is perfectly plain, I take it, that this bill does not compel the use of any particular kind of car. If cars provided with facilities for feeding and watering the animal while in transit are of no practical use, no one will desire them. If they do prove (and they have already) to be of practical use, the producer and stock shipper will demand their use because of the saving in cost of food, in loss by shrinkage, and in time consumed in reaching the market, and the railroads will comply with the demand. If the bill does not impose patent cars on the public without their consent (and it certainly does not) who is injured by them? The existing law and the proposed bill are in this respect exactly alike, and provide that if you transport cattle in cars, be they palace or hovel cars or any kind or sort of car, (and the variety of such is legion,) in which they do have daily proper food and water, you may run for sixty consecutive hours without unloading the same. But if you do not so feed and water said animals in the cars, then, and in that case, you must and shall unload them for that purpose, because humanity and good meat-food demand it. Objection has been made that this bill would compel an outlay on the part of railroads for reconstructing cars which should not be required of them. And here let me say, this legislation is not sought to benefit railroads or to injure them. Whether railroads are to be benefited or not, the demand of humanity is, cure or mitigate this evil. We are not called upon to discuss the question of withholding or granting patents, nor should we be diverted by the consideration of the profits or losses of railroads; it would be unworthy the spirit of the age and a sad commentary upon our common Christianity to say that humanity and mercy must be measured by dollars and cents.

And now let me say once for all, and I know whereof I speak, that the appliances necessary to a perfect and complete car for feeding and watering live stock in cars does not contain one patented or patentable device. There are patents, it is true, but it would be difficult to convince a practical man of their absolute necessity in this case. I speak thus plainly, for I think it about time Congress was relieved of this delusion.

The amendment proposed to section 4390 places the railroads in the Dominion of Canada and roads within the United States and forming through lines of transportation under the same legal restrictions as though the railroad lines were laid entirely within the States, thus preventing any unjust discrimination, any invidious distinction in favor of the Canada roads and their connecting lines.

This section further provides for the appointment of inspectors at the shipping ports to examine into the condition and health of all animals designed for export, either living or dead, and to give a certificate of good health if the circumstances will permit. Armed with this certificate the owner or shipper of either the cattle or beef reaches the English ports vouched for by an authority which will not be questioned, and which will go far in directing the judgment of the inspector when the product is offered for sale. That is substantially all there is in the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I had designed to move to strike out from the pending bill from line 144 to line 160, inclusive, on page 7, when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] made that motion. I was glad he made it, because in my judgment those lines ought to go out. No one would question the wisdom of requiring cattle in transitu to be furnished with food, with water, and with necessary rest; and to all that part of the bill I have nothing to say further than that the act passed on the 3d of March, 1873, which this bill is designed to replace, sufficiently provides for carrying out these objects. That act has been in force from that time to the present, and is now in force. This measure is designed to supplant or replace that act by re-enacting its principal provisions and adding thereto various amendments, and the most important of all the amendments in the bill is embraced between line 144 and line 160, inclusive. I ask the Clerk to report those lines.

Mr. McPHERSON. That part of the bill refers entirely to the inspectors of cattle. It has already been read.

Mr. MAXEY. Let it be read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

And the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to appoint a skilled agent at each of the ports in the United States from which live stock and dressed animals are shipped, whose duty it shall be to inspect all animals designed for export, and, if found in good health, to give the owner or shipper a certificate (in such form as said Commissioner shall direct) stating that said animals were in good health at the time of shipment from said port; and said agent or inspector shall be entitled to and receive such compensation (not more than $1,500 per annum) as shall be fixed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, to be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That the Commissioner of Agriculture may prescribe, by regulation, such reasonable fees for inspection as he may deem just and equitable, to be paid by the owners of cattle exported under the provisions of this act.

Mr. MAXEY. You will observe, Mr. President, that this provision authorizes the Commissioner of Agriculture to appoint an inspector at every port in the United States "from which live stock and dressed animals are shipped." These inspectors, under the provisions of this bill, are, if they find the stock in good health, to give the owner or shipper a certificate stating that said animals were in good health at the time of shipment, and are to receive a salary not exceeding $1,500 per annum, "as shall be fixed by the Commissioner of Agriculture." The first point which would strike the minds of most of us, who are somewhat particular in appointing gentlemen to offices of importance, is, why should the Commissioner of Agriculture be authorized to appoint an officer at a salary of $1,500? Why should not that officer be nominated by the President, and that nomination be sent to this body in order that we might see whether we would advise and consent to the appointment?

It is perfectly clear from what the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] himself tells us of the amount of rascality, fraud, and corruption which he has shown is charged upon State inspectors where they have such, that the office of inspector will be one of great importance and the incumbent be just as liable to temptation, just as open to approach as State inspectors. Why, then, do you give this great power of appointment exclusively and unrestricted to the Commissioner of Agriculture? It seems to me that this is unwise. In fact if it be as the Senator says, that this inspection is authorized under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, it would seem that if any executive officer were to make this appointment, and I deny that the appointments should be thus made, the proper officer would be the Secretary of the Treasury, who has charge of commerce with foreign nations. Why should the Commissioner of Agriculture be given this authority? His duties are wholly internal, and have no connection with foreign commerce.

Second, the bill goes on further to provide:

Provided, however, That the Commissioner of Agriculture may prescribe, by regulation, such reasonable fees for inspection as he may deem just and equitable, to be paid by the owners of cattle exported under the provisions of this act.

This taxes every cattle shipper for an inspection absolutely without effective results, for the inspection is without binding force in any country to which the cattle are shipped.

The first portion of the paragraph moved to be stricken out authorizes the appointment of an inspector at any port in the United States where live stock or dressed animals are shipped to foreign ports. What would be the result? Just as sure as these inspectors are appointed, live stock and dressed animals, one or the other, or both, will be shipped from every port from Portland, Maine, to Brazos Santiago, in Texas, from Sitka, in Alaska, down to San Diego, in California. There will not be a port in the entire length and breadth of the United States that cannot at least send out two dressed sheep and one live one, and that would fill the bill; that would be all that would be necessary, for the language is "live stock and dressed animals." They could send something that would justify the appointment of an inspector at that port, and it would be to the interest of aspirants for inspectorships that this should be done and hence it would be done, and the effect of it would be that you would have an inspector of live stock at every port in the United States at a salary of $1,500 a year; and besides the inspector can charge the shipper of live stock fees as regulated by the Commissioner of Agriculture, according to the proviso at the close of the paragraph, which is included in the motion to strike out.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is to be done with the fees?

Mr. MAXEY. I take it that there will be an inspector who will get $1,500 a year, and these fees go to him. Certainly they do not under this bill inure to the benefit of the Government. These inspectors are to do what? They are to inspect the condition of live stock which are to be shipped from American ports to foreign ports. I ask any Senator at all acquainted with the shipment of cattle or sheep, for example, what inspector on this earth could tell without an actual and close inspection, whether a cow, a beef-steer, or a sheep was diseased or not diseased? Suppose the inspector to run through, as would be the case in my State, three or four or five hundred? How long would it take to inspect them and determine accurately that there was no disease among them, and what would that certificate be worth unless there was an actual inspection of each one of the live stock shipped? For the certificate to do any good the inspector would have to diagnose the case of each one of them. It would be a task that could not be done; there are not enough hours in the twenty-four to do it when the shipment is of any considerable size. But after all, suppose the inspector could make a fair and accurate inspection, and suppose this certificate is given, what good is that to the owner of the stock? It will not weigh a feather in any foreign market, and yet the Government and the owner both pay for it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will interrupt the Senator if it does not disturb him?

Mr. MAXEY. Not at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator fails, I think, to understand the intention, and I think the language also conveys the intention that the Commissioner is to prescribe additional fees for the inspection in order to pay the $1,500. He may impose that upon the owner of the cattle. It is not expected that the Government is to pay $1,500 a year salary in excess of the fees that the Commissioner collects.

Mr. MAXEY. I believe the words of a law generally are taken as evidence of its intention. Now let us see what the bill says:

And said agent or inspector shall be entitled to receive such compensation (not more than $1,500 per annum) as shall be fixed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, to be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

That shows where the money is to come from to pay this $1,500. That fixes upon the Government the payment of the money—the $1,500 or other less sum fixed. The Government of the United States is to pay it out of "any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" like any other salary is paid out of money not otherwise appropriated. So the bill provides. Then comes the following proviso, which by no apt or appropriate words of reference connects itself, so far as these fees are concerned, with the annual salary already provided for in the body of the text, to wit:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture may prescribe by regulation such reasonable fees for inspection as he may deem just and equitable, to be paid by the owners of cattle exported under the provisions of this act.

So that it is manifest, according to the terms of this bill, that the inspector gets out of the Treasury of the United States such compensation (not more than $1,500 per annum) as shall be fixed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and then in addition such reasonable fees for inspection as the Commissioner may deem just and equitable, to be paid by the owner. No word in the bill puts these fees into the Treasury; no reasonable construction puts them there, and the Senator mistakes if he thinks they will ever get into the Treasury.

So I say as the bill is worded the inspector will not only be a charge upon the Government to be paid out of "any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," but in addition thereto he will and can require the owner of the cattle or sheep to pay a fee for the inspection. But after all that, Mr. President, I again ask you what good does it do? What good will a certificate in the pocket of the owner or in the hands of the consignee of those cattle or those sheep or swine do in London, in Liverpool, in Havre de Grace, or anywhere else to which this live stock or these dressed animals may be shipped? Bills of health of a ship are viséed by the officers of the government to which that ship is to sail, not by the officers of the government from which the ship is to sail. We, the other day, in the yellow-fever bill, in guarding against contagion, required that a bill of health should be given by the officers of our Government in South America or elsewhere where a contagious disease might be, to show that the vessel which was to sail to our ports did not have such a disease upon it. It is our officers who are to give the certificate to a vessel coming to this country, and so I say that after you may pass such a measure as this and appoint all your inspectors the certificates given by them will not be worth the paper they are written upon in any part of the world, because the governments to which the shipments are made will be governed by the reports and inspections of their own officers. You would make this system cost the people of the United States this large sum, for I tell you that under the provisions of this bill there will be an inspector at every port of this Union; and you will not only make it cost this large amount to the Government of the United States, but to every man who ships cattle, sheep, or swine it will cost these additional fees, which will aggregate a very large amount.

I take interest in this question because the State which I in part represent is to-day the largest cattle-producing State in this Union, producing under the census of 1870 3,991,158 cattle. That number will be increased by the census of 1880 to not less than six millions. We raised, as shown by the census of 1870, 714,351 sheep. The last reliable data that we have, published by the Wool Producers' Association of the United States at Boston, shows that to-day California is ahead in sheep, Ohio second, and Texas third, so that we may reasonably estimate, and I give this as my opinion, that by the census of 1880 we will have in Texas at least two million sheep, and in all probability two and a half million. We had of swine in 1870 1,202,445. We can raise just as many as we want, for ours is a great corn and mast State, and the product of corn is yearly increasing. At this time the principal shipment of live stock in which we are concerned is that of cattle, and we are using every exertion to open up a direct trade in our cattle with Europe. We can send just as many cattle to market as we please, and will do so when we find it profitable. I call the attention of every Senator in the Chamber who represents a cattle-producing State to the fact that under the provisions of this bill the cattle-raiser, the sheep-raiser, and the swine-raiser are largely charged with fees to be paid to the inspector or somebody else, for, mark you, it is not provided in the bill that the fees thus raised are to go back into the Treasury of the United States to pay the $1,500 salary. That is a separate and distinct clause, and in addition to that $1,500 salary the fees are to be charged, as the bill is worded, to the owners.

But underneath all this what good will your certificate do? Sir, this is no new question to gentlemen who keep up with the cattle business. You will find in the New York Herald of April 27, 1879, a dispatch from Ottawa, Ontario, Canada, dated April 26, 1879, as follows:

In the House of Commons, during a discussion on the item of $10,000 in the estimates for a cattle quarantine, Mr. Mackenzie brought up the matter of the shipment of cattle to England. He hoped that the inability to allow the transhipment of American cattle through Canada to England would be removed as soon as possible, as that trade was very valuable.

Mr. Pope said he had asked the Privy Council whether, if American cattle were carefully examined by veterinary surgeons at ports of entry and shipment, American cattle could be sent by Canada to England? The answer was that there was no alternative. If such shipments were permitted Canadian cattle must be shut out of the English market. Diseased cattle from Portland have been landed in England as late as the first of April. None have been sent from Canada.

So you will see that the British government will depend upon her own inspectors, not upon the certificates which may be given here, because nations are exceedingly jealous; nations will be guided by the official reports of those officers appointed by them and responsible to them. What the Senator from New Jersey said in regard to State inspectors might prove true in regard to the United States inspectors, so that it would at some ports not be difficult, if you paid enough, to get a clear bill of health for your cattle; and if somebody was interested in keeping prices down you might find it, if they paid enough, difficult to get a certificate for a perfectly healthy lot. If such things can be done under State laws, they can be done just as easily under a law of Congress. The vice is in the system.

I do not care to go into other parts of the bill, although there are other portions of it (in which I do not take so deep an interest) which I believe can be well amended; but this part strikes, in my judgment, right at the great cattle interest; and representing in part that State which has a larger interest than any other named State, I have briefly given my reasons for opposition to the part of the bill I have discussed, and trust that the motion of the Senator from Indiana will prevail and that so much of the bill as is embraced between lines 144 and 160 on page 7 will be stricken out.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I desire, in answer to the Senator from Texas, to make one or two observations.

He appears to entirely misunderstand the methods by which this business is conducted. Let me relate to him a little experience, which is a very late experience indeed, and then perhaps he will form a better judgment than the one he has arrived at with respect to this inspection clause.

I think I speak within bounds when I say that from the cities of New York and Jersey City 80 per cent. of all the live stock and dressed animals sent from this country to Great Britain and all other European ports are exported. Four or five months ago a deputation of gentleman largely engaged in the transportation of live and dressed animals visited Washington and asked me to go with them to see the Commissioner of Agriculture or some other appropriate officer of the Government, with a request that a Government officer should be appointed—a skillful man, a scientific man—who could detect disease in animals the same as a physician detects disease in human beings; and that he might be stationed at the shipping points where both live animals and dressed meat were prepared for the English market to examine, to report, and to give a certificate if the animals were found in good health, stating as their reason for such an officer that if they could go to the English market armed with a certificate of health that the animals were from herds of cattle in which no disease existed, and that no disease was about them when they reached the point where they were to be shipped, it would be a fair conclusion to arrive at that when they arrived upon the other side there could be no disease other than what might result from the perils of the trip or the exposure of the trip across the ocean.

I visited the Commissioner of Agriculture, because I believed him to be the appropriate officer of the Government to name this inspector, and by perhaps an exercise of power which he obtained under a strained construction of the law an inspector was appointed to examine all the animals shipped from the ports of New York and Jersey City for a certain period, covering, I think, about ten days. No application was made from the port of Philadelphia, also quite a large exporting port, for an inspector for that port. The cattle and the beef shipped from New York and Jersey City went into the London market in competition with animals and meat exported from Philadelphia. The loss on the Philadelphia shipments during that brief period would have paid for all the inspectors that the Commissioner of Agriculture will appoint for the next five years under this bill.

I care not whether the clause remains in the bill or not. It was put there simply because it had been the experience of gentlemen largely engaged in this trade, those who perhaps control the business, that an inspection was necessary. Now, the Senator from Texas says that it is the inspection made on European soil, at the ports of England, or any foreign country to which we ship the animals that is accepted there. Let me refer the gentleman to the testimony I have adduced here from shipping men, that after an animal is slaughtered, even if the animal was in the last stage of pleuro-pneumonia, it is impossible to detect the disease in the beef. They tell you that the beef looks as good and is as good to all appearance as the best beef found upon the stall. Now, suppose that the animal is slaughtered at the Jersey City abattoir, or at Philadelphia, and no inspection has been made, and an alarm exists among the people abroad that all the animals in this country are diseased; the dressed animal goes there armed with the certificate of inspection of this inspector, a Government agent, supposed to be capable, supposed to be honest, that before the animal was dressed it came from herds of cattle in which no disease had existed, and that no disease existed among the animals when they were slaughtered, would it not be a fair presumption that when they arrived at the other side no disease existed then?

Now, sir, I have no objection to that clause being stricken from the bill if it is of no interest to the people of Texas to assist those gentlemen who are to-day shipping tens of thousands, yea hundreds of thousands, of cattle yearly, taking them from the producers of Texas at their own risk to ship them across the ocean. They simply desire that by authority of law, of which we have none now, the Commissioner of Agriculture or some other proper officer of the Government may appoint an inspector who can certify to the health of the animals; but I beg leave to inform the Senator that there is nothing in the bill which says that either himself or any of his constituents are required to get a certificate; he may ship his cattle across the ocean at his own peril and go into the foreign market as did the Philadelphia shippers and be condemned, not because the cattle were diseased, but because there was with them no certificate of health.

There is another point that the Senator has alluded to, and that is with respect to the payment of the compensation of the inspectors. If there is any defect in the phraseology of this particular clause, it can be amended. The money raised by fees is to go to the compensation of the inspectors, and the fees will be paid by those engaged in the transportation of cattle.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to call attention, for I think I was not mistaken, that the Senator's statement is that it is not an affirmative requirement on shippers to have a certificate. This bill provides:

> And the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to appoint a skilled agent at each of the ports in the United States from which live stock and dressed animals are shipped, whose duty it shall be to inspect all animals designed for export.

At every port where cattle are shipped he must inspect all of them.

Mr. McPHERSON. Suppose some were inspected at New Orleans and this certificate was given on some cattle, not the property of the Senator from Texas; notwithstanding all that, there is no power in this bill or in any other law which says he shall not ship his cattle from that port. He then takes the responsibility of going to the European port with his property without inspection; he has paid no inspection fees. But I say once for all I have no desire to insist on this clause. The law that we seek to amend consists of a few simple sections in the Revised Statutes. This is a new idea advanced, which I believe the necessities of the times require. It is no experiment, it has been proven to be necessary and has proven to be expedient and of benefit to the community which is largely engaged in this trade; but if there is anything in the world in that section to be objected to, let it be stricken out. It is the transportation of cattle mainly that I am concerned about.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, when this bill was called up this morning I gave notice that I would make a motion to strike out between lines 144 and 160 inclusive. At the request of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON,] however, I withheld the motion at that time until he had addressed the Senate. I now make the motion and desire it to be entered. It has not been done. I make the motion formally now because we have been talking about it, and I want it pending.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish the Senator would make the motion to strike out from line 140; but I do not wish to disturb him.

Mr. VOORHEES. Perhaps it ought to go back to line 140. I make the motion in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will see that the lines preceding 144 do not apply to the same section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the motion, as I originally made it, be entered to embrace lines 144 and 160, inclusive.

And now a word. Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of pleasure and interest to the able and instructive speech delivered by the Senator from New Jersey. No subject could appeal to me much more strongly than that which he has discussed, the suffering of dumb animals being carried and slaughtered for the use of man. He has bestowed upon it a labor and research that is commendable and will be useful to us. I say further that I intend to support his bill in the main. I think two or three amendments will make it a most useful and beneficent measure of legislation. I think, however, this provision that I have moved to strike out is an obstacle that ought to be removed. The Senator from Texas has well put the question of expense. There is another question, however. There is too much power by far given to the kind of men that would be inspectors of cattle. They would have the power at any port to destroy the sale of any merchant's cattle that was sent there from the West or any other place. They would have the power by raising a suspicion of the health of cattle, whether it was so or not, to knock down the price and destroy the sale, and thus ruin the man who had brought them to that port.

I do not mean to be censorious or uncharitable toward my fellowmen when I say that this class of persons with that kind of a salary would be most easily approached by those interested in reducing the price of cattle and would be open to constant bribery and corruption, and the shipper of cattle from the Western States would be absolutely in the power of some one person at each port that the Commissioner of Agriculture might see fit to appoint as an inspector of diseased stock. That is too much power to give to that class of persons.

I desire, however, mainly, for the few moments that I shall occupy the floor, to submit a most interesting and, I think, a very valuable contribution to the literature of this question from Professor James Law, professor of veterinary medicine in Cornell University, a member of the board of health of the State of New York, and a fellow of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons of London. It has been sent to me, and as I have familiarized myself with the handwriting, which is a little difficult, I will read it myself to the Senate:

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL PROVIDING FOR INSPECTING CATTLE IN TRANSIT.

No one who is acquainted with the nature of the lung fever of cattle and who is anxious to see it extirpated from American herds can approve of the present proposal to expend the Government appropriation in simply inspecting the stock at different points along the great channels of traffic. Yet as the proposition seems to be received with much favor in certain influential quarters it may be well to state shortly some of the more serious objections to its adoption:

1. The prolonged latency of the disease will render it futile.—The proposal to check the disease by inspection of animals in transit proceeds on the assumption that every infected animal will be thus detected and detained. But this is far from being the case. After the disease germs have been taken into the system they lie there dormant for from one to two months on an average, and even longer in exceptional cases, and only develop disease at the end of this period. During the whole of this long period of latency or incubation there is no modification nor impairment of health, nor any appreciable symptom by which the presence of these disease germs can be recognized by even the most skilled expert. Cattle with these germs in their systems might therefore easily cross the Atlantic and the whole breadth of the American or European continent, pass successfully the ordeal of the strictest professional examination at different points on their route, and be finally unshipped with a series of certificates of health which are only so many snares and impositions upon intending purchasers. Every such infected animal, notwithstanding it has run the gauntlet of a succession of examinations, will none the less surely show sickness in due time and infect any herd in which it may be placed. Instances of this kind are daily observed, yet I may be allowed to quote one of the most recent examples that have come up.

He speaks as a member of the New York board of health, and my apology for reading this to the Senate is the fact that this man is eminent in his specialty, and has devoted a life-time to its study:

Isaac Billard, dealer, Cutchogen, about January 1, took a herd of one hundred and twelve calves from the New York stock-yards, to which we have traced many similar outbreaks, and sold them to farmers in the towns of Southampton and Easthampton, Suffolk County, where this plague had never existed before. Wherever these calves went disease and death followed, not among themselves alone, but also in the herds with which they cohabited. We were only apprised of this outbreak in the first week of May, and beside the previous losses we have already had to slaughter over forty animals in the towns mentioned, and have not yet traced out the destination of all the Billard herd. Here the farmers purchased what they supposed to be perfectly healthy stock, and inasmuch as the calves had come straight from the infecting place, and had had no time for the development of the malady, they would almost certainly have passed the most rigid professional examination.

The fact of the apparent health of these infected cattle makes them far more dangerous than if they had been transported when in the height of the disease and with their sufferings patent to all observers. In such a case the intending purchaser would have declined, or would at least have withheld them from mixing with his other stock. As tested by this feature of the disease, therefore, "inspection in transit" is not only a farce but must be actually injurious in fostering a false sense of security and promoting the safer course of guaranteeing the stock by the Government or the purchaser.

2. Occult forms of the plague will escape detection.—In dealing with the disease in New York we are continually brought in contact with cases that have become chronic, in which all the active symptoms of fever have subsided—the pulse, the temperature, the appetite, the rumination, and even the flow of milk have become natural or nearly so—and in which the affection must be detected by the most careful auscultation and percussion, if at all. When we open these cases after death we usually find that a portion of the lung has passed through the active stage and has become solid and fibrous, or more commonly it has become gangrenous and been inclosed in a fibrous cyst, or it has softened and produced large cavities, but in all cases alike the surrounding lung tissue is being slowly invaded, the poison is still generated, and the air loaded with infecting material. Now, such cases can usually be detected by the accomplished veterinarian if the examination is made with care and in the necessary conditions of quiet and stillness; but such quiet and stillness can rarely be had in the midst of five hundred or one thousand animals, strangers to each other and to the place, and amid the commotion of passing trains, shipping, unshipping, feeding, &c., at a railroad station.

In illustration of this I may be allowed to add that men holding diplomas of veterinary colleges have repeatedly in our experience disbelieved in the sickness of the animals we have condemned, and have only been convinced and had their sneers turned into confusion when the carcasses were opened and the diseased lungs exposed. So it is with the cattle-owners, who often allow the slaughter of the diseased under protest, but are speedily convinced and brought to favor our work as soon as the carcasses are opened. At Bridgehampton a crowd of experienced stockmen denounced our action and protested against the slaughter of what they considered sound animals, but were so convinced by the post mortem examinations that they at once declared that no more such examinations were necessary, and that if we said the half of the herd should be slaughtered they would fully indorse our decision. One of the most incredulous afterward offered to pay out of his own pocket the value of such animals as we set aside for slaughter, if the owners (who had not been present at our previous post mortem examinations) were still unconvinced when such cattle were opened.

3. Incubating and occult cases alone shipped, and pre-eminently dangerous.—If it is argued that the inspectors would detect the actually and surely sick, it may be said that they are far less dangerous than the others, for owners will rarely ship an obviously diseased animal, which is likely to die on the way, or to ruin the market for their remaining stock on arrival at their destination. The ordinary course is to withhold or even destroy the unquestionably sick, and to send to the market the rest of the herd, many of which the owner knows full well will be themselves sick ere long if he retains possession of them. These comprise the infected beasts that are still in the incubation stage and which therefore cannot be detected, and the occult and chronic cases which can only be recognized by the most skillful examination and a quiet that can rarely be assured for cattle in transit.

4. Inspection of all cattle in transit impracticable.—The great number of cattle transported on our great lines of rail must forbid anything like a satisfactory examination in transit. By one line alone as many as one hundred car-loads of cattle will arrive at a given point in a single day. Allowing sixteen cattle to each car-load and but ten minutes for the inspection of each animal, this would take an inspector over two hundred and sixty-six hours, or nearly twenty-four days of twelve hours each, to accomplish the task. Even if we could get for each point a staff of twenty-four competent inspectors, (a very questionable supposition,) the inspection would be impracticable, as no one could keep up the requisite, incessant, and intense application for twelve hours out of the day.

5. Inspection useless and uncalled for in the case of the great body of western cattle.—The proposition, even if it could be carried into effect, would be worthless. Inspectorships to detect the lung fever at Kansas City, Saint Louis, Chicago, Toledo, Buffalo, &c., would simply entail an amount of exhaustive and fruitless labor on conscientious incumbents, or would be accepted as comfortable sinecures by the more lazy or less scrupulous. No lung fever in our western herds has ever been proved.

This is a comfort to us western men. This is eminently a western subject, and I was very glad to find that statement from such eminent authority.

The American stock condemned in England (even if it were conclusively shown that they suffered from lung fever) were shipped from stock-yards to which stock from New York and other infected centers had been sent, and there is no evidence to show that the cars and ships that conveyed them had not previously carried infected cattle or hides. The appearance of the western cattle and our New York stock-yards gives no support to the idea that they come from infected districts, while on the other hand the western cows that are kept for a sufficient length of time to allow of infection and the development of the disease after arrival, fall easy victims, showing that they are strangers to that immunity which is gained by a first attack of the plague.

The Ohio cow, which last year conveyed the lung fever to Clinton, New Jersey, had staid over at least one day in New York City, where she had ample opportunity for contracting the disease.

6. Inspection to be useful must embrace the entire herd from which the animal is to be taken, and must be supplemented by a history of soundness for at least three months previous.—Nothing short of the careful inspection of the entire herd with which an animal has cohabited can give security, nor will even this suffice, unless we know that there has been no addition made to the herd, no visitation to or from, and no sickness for at least three months previous. Neglect these obvious precautions and the infection will certainly escape us by reason of the long period of incubation.

7. Dealing with the infected herd the only sound method.—This brings us to the conclusion that all methods are fallacious and misleading that do not strike at the root of the contagion, the infected herd. The only rational course is to stop the movement of cattle in all infected districts, to keep an accurate registry of the herds, to allow no changes to be made in any herd without a permit given after professional examination, to allow no animals to leave recently infected herds except for immediate slaughter, and to adopt a system of prompt sacrifice of the sick and thorough disinfection of the buildings and movable articles. The segregation of all herds and many other minor details are no less essential, though it is needless to refer to them here. It is enough to say that success will only crown the well-directed efforts for the extinction of the disease in the infected herds, and that anything that will divert the national means and energies from this will favor the spread of the plague rather than its extermination. The proscription of an infected district and the inspection of all cattle passing out of it can only be of value if supplemented by a quarantine of two months. This would allow time for the animal to pass through the period of incubation, and if found well throughout the whole of this period of detention, a certificate of soundness might safely be given. But such a quarantine would be a virtual prohibition of the cattle traffic, and would prove incomparably more costly and expensive than would the prompt slaughter of the whole of the infected and exposed herds and the indemnification of their owners out of the national exchequer. It would have the further disadvantage of making little or no advance toward the extinction of the plague in the infected area itself.

In adopting measures for the stamping out of the pestilence the further we get from the individual centers of contagion the weaker and the more ineffectual must be our work. To forbid the exit of sick cattle from a State and to enforce this without quarantine at the border we have seen to be most fallacious. To embargo a county or town is better, as there is more likelihood of our ascertaining the particular localities or herds from which the animals come, and greater precautions can be taken accordingly. The quarantining of the infected herds and those adjacent is incomparably better than either, though even this is eminently unsatisfactory and dangerous, unless associated with the prompt slaughter of the sick and infected and the thorough disenfection of all that has come in contact with them. General measures are comparatively futile; the particular alone can succeed.

Whenever, therefore, a State fails to act thus particularly, or with every separate center of infection, the United States ought to come to the rescue and apply those measures by which the pestilence may be exterminated.

JAMES LAW, F. R. C. V. S.,
Professor of Veterinary Medicine, Cornell University.

BOARD OF HEALTH,
New York, May 24, 1879.

I have read this, Mr. President, for the purpose, besides its being heard here, of transferring it to the RECORD so that Senators may look at it with more satisfaction than they have listened to it. There may be suggestions in it in which I do not concur and in which other Senators may not concur, but in the main I regard it as a valuable paper, and as such entitled to the recognition which I have invoked for it in this body.

I can only repeat what I said in rising that it is my purpose to aid the Senator from New Jersey in perfecting a bill to relieve us of the stigma of cruelty to dumb animals. I have witnessed it, and so has every other Senator, on our lines of road. No subject is more worthy of our attention than this, and I hope the bill may be put in such shape as to meet general favor here.

I think, however, this provision ought to go out, not only because of the reasons given so strongly and clearly by Professor Law, but for the reasons presented by the Senator from Texas, and for the reason which I stated when I first rose that it clothes men, if they choose to abuse their trust, with a power over the stock raisers and stock shippers of this country which ought not to be given to any one. It is the power of price and value which is placed in the hands of these proposed inspectors. By a look, a nod, a suspicion, a suggestion that a man's stock is not very well they can bankrupt the western stock raiser and shipper and control the price of his cattle, and they can do it in the interest of those who desire to purchase.

I am very glad to know that the honorable Senator from New Jersey is willing that this provision may go out of the bill, and then, with perhaps one or two suggestions of minor importance, I do not see why we cannot support the measure.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. The stock producers of the West transport their cattle to some of the great distributing points, to wit, Saint Louis, Chicago, Pittsburgh, or Buffalo. There they are sold to eastern buyers, to be used for any purpose that, in the judgment of the eastern buyers, they can best use them. These cattle go, for instance, to the port of New York. The party who has purchased the cattle of the producer in the western city desires to ship them abroad; but he says to himself, "I cannot safely ship them abroad unless I can arm myself with a certificate of inspection." Now, I wish to know in what way that affects the value of the animal to the western producer if, in the judgment of the party who desires to export them, he wants inspection and is willing to pay for it?

Another question I should like to ask the Senator: Will he tell me any means by which these gentlemen largely engaged in exporting live stock can obtain inspection under and by authority of law without passing some law under which it can be done?

Mr. VOORHEES. In regard to the first question propounded by the Senator from New Jersey I have this to say: These men are in some sense toll-gatherers at the gates of commerce on the cattle that pass through. They have double means of corruptly making money. They can prey on the anxiety and desire of the stock raiser and shipper and seek pay from them for getting a favorable certificate; and on the other hand they can play into the hands of the buyers, as I have already explained; for if the raisers cannot ship them abroad and cannot get a certificate of health from the inspector they will have to take their cattle home or dispose of them as best they can. The Senator says the owner can take them abroad. I have this to answer in regard to that: a certificate of inspection, if he gets it, is of no service to him in Europe whatever, and if he does not get it he is just as well off as if he has it in his pocket. In Europe the inspection at the ports of export has been found to have failed to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle there, and England has at last found it necessary to schedule all countries known to be infected, and to slaughter all cattle landed from such scheduled countries, and our country is included in that schedule now, and no certificate at one of our ports can take us out of that schedule. America has recently been scheduled, and no system but the actual extermination and destruction of the disease in the eastern ports will relieve the American exporter of any cattle coming through the eastern ports, for the foreign countries with whom we deal and who buy our beef, failing to know this by the system of inspection, have scheduled the United States with those countries which are known as infected with the cattle disease. The consequence is that our stock is slaughtered as soon as it is landed. The certificates of inspection which you will tax the farmers of Indiana to obtain for their cattle would not be worth a straw when they got to Europe with them.

Mr. McPHERSON. In respect to cattle that are slaughtered in this country and transported in refrigerated vessels, what becomes of them upon the other side; what becomes of the question of inspection there in that case?

Mr. VOORHEES. That is a matter for England; I cannot answer it. But I promise you one thing, that your inspection will not help them any in England.

Mr. McPHERSON. Would it convince the Senator if two animals were offered to him for consumption, one of them having been inspected by a competent physician who declared that he had inspected the animal previously to its being slaughtered and found it in every respect a healthy animal, and the other one, for some reason best known to himself, he refused to give any opinion upon—would it convince the Senator from Indiana that one beef was better than the other?

Mr. VOORHEES. Does the Senator pretend to say that this system of inspection would subject the cow or beef animal to the inspection of a competent veterinary surgeon, when it has been shown here that if there was a corps of twenty-four at each one of the principal ports they could not give more than ten minutes to each animal that they were to inspect? I can say to him and answer the question directly, it would not make one particle of difference to me when I sat down to a beefsteak whether the kind of inspector who would be appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, with all respect to him be it spoken, had had ten minutes to look at the cow and had looked at her, whether she had passed or not such an inspection. I should inspect the steak myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I am very sensitive on the subject of beefsteaks, I wish both Senators would allow me to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McPHERSON. I would ask the Senator to withdraw the motion, because I think we can close this up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, you cannot finish the bill to-night. It is late. It will be the first thing in order to-morrow, the Senator knows.

Mr. McPHERSON. I did not suppose there would be any objection to the bill except on this point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes, it will require a good deal of consideration yet, I fear.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Vermont will let us vote on the pending amendment, which I think we are now ready for a vote on, it will take but little time, and it will make that much progress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not sure that that amendment is ready for a vote yet.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As there is nothing else pressing really, and as this will be the first thing in order to-morrow, it will not lose anything by my motion and there are matters for consideration in executive session that ought to be attended to. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. Pending that I move that the Senate adjourn. I think there is no hurry about the executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend from Kentucky will withdraw his motion to adjourn.

Mr. BECK. Very well, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair.) The motion to adjourn being withdrawn, the question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 27, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 70) authorizing Commodore J. W. A. Nicholson, United States Navy, to accept from his Catholic majesty the King of Spain the Grand Cross of Naval Merit; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) authorizing Lieutenant Z. L. Tanner, of the United States Navy, late commanding Pacific Mail steamer City of Peking, to accept a pair of flower vases and a lacquered box from the Japanese government.

The bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) authorizing the payment of a portion of the Virginius indemnity fund to the mother of General W. A. C. Ryan, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TAXES ON CHURCH AND EDUCATIONAL PROPERTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 23d instant, reports of the auditor and collector of the District showing what sums have been received in respect of general and special taxes assessed on churches, colleges, school-houses, and educational institutions since June 17, 1870, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the communication and accompanying papers be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of H. R. Robinson, of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of a law granting him a pension for services rendered the Government as a soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ELECTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. McDONALD. I present the memorial of J. B. Greene and the accompanying petition of soldiers and sailors of the State of Rhode Island. I ask that they be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana presents a memorial, and asks that it be read. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the memorial about? Mr. President, the objection to reading endless memorials is that it costs the United States a great deal. The rules require that Senators shall state the substance of the memorials they present and that then they shall be appropriately referred. To have memorials read, as I see has become unhappily a practice of late in the Senate, is of course a very expensive performance—that is the only objection to it—making the RECORD so enormously big that a Senator or anybody else cannot transport it without hiring an extra freight car to go along with him.

Mr. McDONALD. My reason for asking that the memorial and petition be read is that I expect to accompany them by resolutions directing their reference to certain standing committees of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Every memorial is referred as a matter of course to a standing committee of the Senate without a particular resolution.

Mr. McDONALD. I think that the facts set out in these papers require special reference. There may not be the slightest authority on the part of the committee to examine into the matter without a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator then, in accordance with the rules, state the substance of these memorials, which will perhaps answer just as well?

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Secretary to return them to me that I may do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is objection to the reading of these memorials the Chair will put the question to the Senate. The question whether the papers shall be read cannot be debated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the first place, the rules require every Senator in presenting a memorial to state in substance what it contains. I of course do not know what these memorials are, and only make the point in order to see if we cannot correct the practice we have been running into of lumbering up the RECORD with the printing of memorials upon all sorts of subjects.

Mr. McDONALD. The memorial of J. B. Greene is accompanied by a petition entitled as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives
of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States, of the city and county of Providence, State of Rhode Island, respectfully pray and ask that your honorable bodies will, by resolve, resolution, or otherwise, instruct or demand the President to execute, enforce, conform in letter and spirit to sections 1754 and 1755, Revised Statutes of the United States.

This is signed by some three hundred and odd persons, who sign themselves as soldiers and sailors.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a remark in reference to that petition?

Mr. McDONALD. I do not know yet, Mr. President, whether the petition is to be read to the Senate or not. I should certainly have no objection to hearing the Senator.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a remark in reference to the petition he has just read? Will he yield to me for one moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules are very plain. Rule 14 provides that—

Before any petition or memorial shall be received or read at the table, it shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist, and a brief statement of its contents shall be made by the Senator or presiding officer presenting it.

Then Rule 15 provides that—

When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any Senator, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, and without debate.

If there is objection to the reading of these memorials, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate; but it is not a question that can be debated.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for one minute?

Mr. McDONALD. I was going to state briefly the substance of this memorial and petition.

The accompanying petition of Augustus Woodbury and other honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States, and citizens of the State of Rhode Island, relates to an alleged violation of sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the appointment of wounded soldiers and sailors to civil office; and also relates to alleged violations of civil-service reform in the State of Rhode Island.

The memorial of J. B. Greene relates to interference of Federal officers in the elections in Rhode Island and the denial of the right to vote to citizens of the United States who are also citizens of the said State of Rhode Island, and also to alleged frauds and undue influence practiced against the citizens of said State at the late elections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That one I shall be very glad indeed to have read the full length; I do not know what the others are about, I am sure. That one I think I can understand the general purport of, and I should like to hear it read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which memorial does the Senator ask to have read?

Mr. McDONALD. I ask to have read the memorial of J. B. Greene and the accompanying petition of soldiers and sailors of the United States who have signed this petition.

Mr. BURNSIDE. From personal knowledge I beg to submit that the two papers have no connection whatever with each other.

Mr. McDONALD. The only way that can be determined is by reading them. I think they do have.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Read them; it will not cost more than a thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the memorial? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Indiana will send it to the Secretary's desk.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask that the accompanying papers be read also.

Mr. ALLISON. What are they?

Mr. McDONALD. One is a letter of civilians submitting these grievances, and the other certificates of character and qualifications and conduct of these officers and soldiers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives
of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States, of the city and county of Providence, State of Rhode Island, respectfully pray and petition that your honorable bodies will, by resolve, resolution, or otherwise, instruct or demand the President to execute, enforce, conform in letter and spirit to sections 1754 and 1755 Revised Statutes of the United States, March 3, 1865, especially in regard to appointments made for collections of customs dues at the district and port of Providence.

SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

SEC. 1755. In grateful recognition of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the country, by reason of wounds, disease, or the expiration of terms of enlistment, it is respectfully recommended to bankers, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, farmers, and persons engaged in industrial pursuits, to give them the preference for appointments to remunerative situations and employments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish the names read? There are a great many of them.

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir; I do not desire to have them read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better have the whole thing read.

Mr. VOORHEES. How many names are there, I should like to inquire?

Mr. McDONALD. Three hundred.

Mr. VOORHEES. Three hundred have that cause of complaint!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Indiana to say that the other papers sent up are to accompany the memorial?

Mr. McDONALD. They accompany the memorial of J. B. Greene, which ought to have been read first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let that be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives
of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

I have the honor to submit a petition of the honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States, residents of the city and county of Providence, State of Rhode Island. It is herein alleged that several honorably discharged soldiers have been within a short period dismissed the custom-house at the port of Providence, Rhode Island. Their places have been filled by civilians with one exception, and mainly by the relations of Hon. H. B. ANTHONY. Several of these deposed veterans are and were ready to submit to a competitive examination; this privilege was denied them.

Gallant men, with dependent families, have been displaced to make room for mere striplings who were in swaddling clothes when these veterans were fighting the battles of their country; men whose sense of duty impelled them to the front in the late struggle are now forced to yield their well-earned places to men who were speculating in cotton or other merchandise during the late war. Thus the statutes have been violated, the rules of civil-service reform have been disregarded, and nepotism has been a marked feature in the selection of civilians to fill the positions of the discharged veterans. It seems to be the purpose of persons most interested to confine the Federal patronage within a limited circle, even to the prejudice of good government. For a long time the interference of Federal officers at the polls, at town, city, and State elections, has restrained men from the exercise of rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Your honorable bodies are respectfully asked to interfere in behalf of the parties aggrieved. Subjoined is the roster of the custom-house of the port of Providence, Rhode Island, names of the civilians marked thus, ×:

Cyrus Harris, ×	$5,000
Edward P. Burrows, ×	3,000
E. C. Ashley, ×	1,800
Nathan Gaff, jr., soldier	1,600
Robert Perkins, ×	1,095
George W. Pettis, soldier	1,095
Master Burrows, ×	1,095
J. E. Burrows, soldier	1,095
Joseph T. Read, ×	1,095
E. M. Arnold, ×	1,095
J. R. Skimer, soldier	1,095
B. C. Allen, ×	900
William S. Chase, soldier	1,095
——— Boatman, ×	500
E. C. Pomroy, soldier	1,095
Total	22,655

A glance at the above names and figures shows that the civilians far outnumber the veterans. The money paid to the civilians is twice that paid to the veterans.

RECAPITULATION.

The pay-roll of the custom-house proximates $22,655. Of this amount about $7,000 only is paid to the veterans, while upward of $15,000 is paid to civilians. One of the soldiers in the above list, a relative of the senior Senator of Rhode Island, also holds a clerkship in a large mercantile house, and thus draws a double salary. Another of the list of civilians, aside from his private business, is known to be the active manager of town, city, and State elections, even to the prejudice of good government. The course of the leading Federal officers in this respect at least has become odious to the most respectable portion of the people. That the office of the appraiser of foreign merchandise can be dispensed with with no prejudice to the interest of the Government is deemed a worthy subject for consideration of a committee from your honorable bodies. The question of proscription, the undue restraints and influence of Federal officers at the polls over the morally weak, as well as the question of the violation of the statute in civil appointments, is also deemed a worthy subject for consideration of a committee from your honorable bodies.

All of which is very respectfully submitted in behalf of the party and persons aggrieved,

By your most obedient servant,

J. B. GREENE,
127 Broad street, Providence, Rhode Island.

P. S.—This question is most respectfully submitted: When those who make the laws violate them or fail to conform to their provisions, is there a remedy? If so, where is it to be found?

J. B. G.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition shall be made of these papers?

Mr. McDONALD. I offer the following resolution in connection with the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana offers a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene and the accompanying petition of Augustus Woodbury and other honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States and citizens of the State of Rhode Island as relates to the alleged violation of sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the appointment of wounded soldiers and sailors to civil offices, and also so much of said memorial as relates to alleged violations of civil-service reform in the State of Rhode Island, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, with authority to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BURNSIDE and Mr. EDMUNDS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McDONALD. I also offer in the same connection——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose we dispose of this resolution before the Senator offers anything more.

Mr. McDONALD. I would rather have the two resolutions go together.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think not, Mr. President. There is now a resolution before the Senate. We will go "according to Hoyle"—if that is a phrase my honorable friend and his associates understand——

Mr. McDONALD. I understand that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I presume they do. I suppose that the Senator from Indiana did not select this particular morning when the Senator named in one of these papers is absent from the city——

Mr. McDONALD. I did not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will wait until I am through, then he will have a good time to speak. I suppose that the Senator from Indiana did not select this particular morning when the Senator from Rhode Island who sits nearest me [Mr. ANTHONY] has been absent from the city two or three days to present this petition of Greene transmitting a memorial also addressed to the Congress of the United States, a somewhat singular performance, and so I suppose he will not object to the matter going over until to-morrow morning when the Senator from Rhode Island will be present.

Mr. McDONALD. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Therefore, Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of this resolution. It is rather a new and a jolly thing for citizens of the United States who have a grievance to redress and who petition Congress for its redress, as they have an inalienable right to do—and not to have it tabled as such petitions used to be in old times by a certain party still supposed by some to be alive—it is rather remarkable to have a memorial of that kind introduced into the Senate by a communication from somebody else who is to act as the proctor or guardian of the memorialists and to transmit their petition with a memorial of his own with a running commentary upon the grievances that are to be redressed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say respectfully to the Senator from Vermont that the objection, in the opinion of the Chair, carries the resolution over, and it is not debatable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand the Chair to decline to hear me any further?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate by unanimous consent agree to hear the Senator, the Chair will hear him with great pleasure.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont be allowed to proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah. I know how the Senate is composed, and I am too fearful of the thunderbolts of Jove to go on for a single moment when I am interrupted in that way.

Mr. McDONALD. I hope unanimous consent will be given. ["Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Vermont having been seated by the Chair will not trespass upon the unanimous good-will of the Senate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Is there anything to prevent a remark from myself on this subject now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may be wrong, but in the opinion of the Chair when a resolution is objected to the objection carries it over under the rules and there can be no debate upon it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to say a word or two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is unanimous consent, however, the Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask unanimous consent to make a few remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the Senator from Rhode Island addressing the Senate?

Mr. VOORHEES. On this condition, that there shall be the same consent given to anybody on this side who wants to discuss the matter.

Several SENATORS. On either side.

Mr. VOORHEES. On either side, on both sides, on all sides, if there are more than two who may wish to discuss this question.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask for the privilege of saying a few words.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to allow me just one word. I certainly desire that he shall have an opportunity to address the Senate——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I could not go on with my remarks myself, we must not have any more words just now.

Mr. McDONALD. I wish to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has asked unanimous consent of the Senate to speak upon this resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (to Mr. BURNSIDE.) Wait until to-morrow.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not care to speak at length now, but I wish to make a few remarks before the matter passes from the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. VOORHEES. I object unless the question is open to debate on all sides of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A conditional objection is an objection.

Mr. McDONALD. I hope my colleague will not object, because I prefer that the Senator from Rhode Island should be heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator's colleague has objected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana withdraw his objection?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has unanimous consent to proceed.

Mr. McDONALD. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me just a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the Senator from Rhode Island who had unanimous consent; not the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to allow me just one moment out of his time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, only the Senator from Rhode Island is allowed to speak. I found myself cut off a few minutes ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will delay the Senate but a few moments.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to the Senator from Indiana speaking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. McDONALD. I understand that the resolution has already gone over under objection, so that there is nothing before the Senate; and I send a resolution now to the Chair which I ask to have read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate can give leave to a Senator to speak whether there is anything before the Senate or not, and the Senate has given that leave to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. I knew of this petition before its presentation. It is signed by Union soldiers, and was shown to me three or four weeks ago, when I offered to present it to the Senate myself. Dr. Greene, who had possession of it, declined to allow me to present it, saying he was instructed to have it presented by another person.

The petition, you will observe, is entirely independent of the memorial of Dr. Greene. I have the authority from the ex-soldier whose name is at the head of the list, Rev. Augustus Woodbury, to withdraw it from the petition. That authority was sent to me when he discovered the use that was to be made of it, and I doubt not the same authority would be given by many of those who signed it if opportunity offered.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if I did not say to him before introducing these papers that it was not my purpose to press them at all this morning, but simply to present them as a duty which I owed to the party who brought them to me, and to let the petitions and the resolutions with which I felt it my duty to accompany the petitions stand over until the State of Rhode Island should have full representation in this Chamber?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to say a few words more, Mr. President.

Mr. McDONALD. I also——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which gentleman has the floor, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, at the close of the war the collector of the port of Providence was a civilian. At the expiration of his term the office was filled by a soldier who I and others recommended. I was not then a Senator, nor was I in politics in any way. That soldier filled the office for eight years. The postmaster of the city of Providence was a civilian and a personal friend of my colleague. At the expiration of his term a soldier was appointed to the position upon the recommendation and solicitation of my colleague, [Mr. ANTHONY.] The two United States collectors of internal revenue were civilians. The two districts were consolidated into one and a soldier placed in charge of it at the solicitation of the Rhode Island delegation, among them my colleague, [Mr. ANTHONY.] After good service this soldier resigned. His place was filled by a soldier at my solicitation. A great many of the subordinates of these officers are soldiers. The distinguished soldiers appointed as chiefs of the offices named have performed their duties most creditably, I am proud to say. A vacancy occurred by the expiration of the term of service of the collector last February. For reasons which I at the proper time will give I recommended a civilian for appointment to that office, and my colleague, until I had determined upon it, knew nothing whatever of it. The gentleman whom I recommended, Mr. Cyrus Harris, is a highly respectable merchant of the city of Providence, a gentleman of more than sixty years of age, who has always stood high in our State for integrity and intelligence. The recommendation was acquiesced in by the other members of the delegation and he was appointed; and, as I before said, my colleague had nothing whatever to do with it until I suggested his name. My colleague, when I first named the subject to him, protested against the appointment. He said, "General, this action will be misunderstood, and I ask that the appointment may not be made, or rather that you do not make the recommendation."

The appointment of Mr. Harris was made, and he has made two removals in the custom-house, one of whom was a brother of this memorialist. I am not here to say anything against this brother, or the other soldier removed, but I will say that the former was a soldier in California and New Mexico during the war, placed on duty there to relieve the regular troops, that they might go to the front, but I doubt if he ever saw many rebels. He certainly never met the kind of an enemy that his successor met. The man appointed in his place is a wounded soldier, who served gallantly during the war in the presence of real rebels. Therefore, as far as this petitioner is concerned, and as far as his brother is concerned, there is no right of complaint. Of the other soldier removed I will say nothing, except that his record for gallantry and efficiency was excellent. The collector had his reasons for removing him and gave them. It is enough for me to say that both my colleague and myself have abstained from asking the heads of any of these offices to appoint a single subaltern.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask a question for the sake of understanding this discussion. Is the question before the Senate whether the Senator from Rhode Island or the Senator from Indiana is the best friend of the Union soldier of the war of the rebellion?

Mr. BURNSIDE. My record as far as that is concerned I am perfectly willing to stand upon, and I of course desire no comparison with any Senator on that subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe the Senator was in the Army himself awhile.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I lose no opportunity to recommend soldiers when it can be fairly done; but I do not think the soldiers ought to occupy all the offices of the country, and they do not seek to. It is not for the best interests of the country and it is not for the best interests of the soldiers. This petition, Mr. President, was signed without full knowledge of what was to be done with it, particularly without the knowledge that it was to be accompanied by this memorial, which is unjust to my colleague. Now, Mr. President, I do not propose to sit here and allow my colleague to be condemned and abused, no matter by whom, for doing things which I did myself. I was mainly instrumental in the appointment of this collector, and for all the changes he has made I, more than any one but himself, am responsible. He doubtless made them because he thought they were for the best interests of the service.

Mr. President, with these few remarks I am quite willing to let this matter go over. The resolution contemplates an examination into the subject-matter of the petition by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

If the Senator from Indiana will excuse me, I will refer to another resolution which he proposes to offer, which is to call for an examination into the manner of conducting elections in Rhode Island. I say to him that I will be very glad indeed, and I have no doubt my colleague will be glad, to have that resolution pass and to have the investigating committee of which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is chairman come to Rhode Island. They shall have every possible assistance in conducting the investigations. We will ask them to make this examination immediately upon their arrival, because after they have finished it we will take them down to Squantum and treat them to a clam bake, and if they do not get their record in black and white before that entertainment they will feel inclined to take back anything they may have found against us. Therefore I advise them to have their record irrevocably fixed before going to Squantum. But, Mr. President, we are not afraid of investigation in Rhode Island. Our citizens are fair people in all their dealings; they are law-abiding people, and your committee I am sure will find accordingly in any report it may make. Bummers may come before it and tell their stories, but your committee will soon discover that their statements amount to nothing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are still in order.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask that the resolution which I have already sent to the desk be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does that resolution refer to a petition presented by the Senator?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; the second resolution I sent up. The first one has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Secretary read the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene as relates to the interference of Federal officers in the election in Rhode Island and to the denial of the right to vote to any citizens of the United States who are also citizens of the State of Rhode Island, and also the alleged frauds or undue influence practiced against citizens of said State at the late election, be referred to the select committee to inquire into alleged frauds in the late elections, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. McDONALD. Now, Mr. President, I desire that that resolution shall also lie on the table till the Senators from Rhode Island are both present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is any need of that. I hope the resolution will be adopted this minute; and while I am hoping——

Mr. McDONALD. As I have offered the resolution, I now move that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to the present consideration of the resolution, then, because we can have it up to-morrow and debate it. I do not want to have it put into the tomb where sundry other resolutions have gone, never to be heard of again.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not want the Senator from Vermont to take my resolution off my hands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rules allow me to take it that far, so that I can say a word on it to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is objected to and goes over. Petitions and memorials are still in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BRUCE presented a petition of R. M. Hall, M. D., and others, citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying the passage of an act requiring the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company to close up the affairs of that institution and distribute the assets among the creditors thereof; which was referred to the select committee on the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

Mr. VANCE presented a memorial of the churches of the District of Columbia praying the passage of a joint resolution declaring the act of June 17, 1870, to be still in force, and for the passage of a bill to exempt the churches of the District of Columbia from taxation; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF PAPERS.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that an order for printing may be made by the Senate in the case of some papers which I am instructed to report from the Committee on Finance relating to Senate bill No. 601. I ask that they be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator state what the papers are?

Mr. BAYARD. The papers consist of some communications from the Department relative to a bill now before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. In reference to a measure now pending before them. We ask that the papers be printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection; but my inquiry is what is the nature of the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. The subject of the correspondence is loss in the removal of distilled spirits from the warehouse to the point of export.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made if there is no objection. The Chair hears none.

USE OF TROOPS.

Mr. DAWES. Before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the orders of the day I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to correct a mistake into which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] fell yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a unanimous consent?

Several SENATORS. To what?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts wishes to correct some error in the speech of the Senator from Indiana yesterday.

Mr. McDONALD. I hope there will be unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. DAWES. I send to the desk to be read an extract from the speech of the Senator from Indiana delivered yesterday.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In the State of Massachusetts more money was paid out of the public Treasury to control the elections than in all the States lately in rebellion. Will her Senators in this Chamber say that this was necessary to secure a free and fair election of members of Congress? If not, for what purpose was the Federal machinery brought into play in that State? I suppose there can be but one answer to that question. It was to prevent the people of Massachusetts from selecting for their governor a certain person, well known to the history of this country, who had made himself obnoxious to the political leaders of that State.

General Butler is no personal or political favorite of mine, yet he is a man of great ability and is a citizen of Massachusetts. The people of that State had the right to choose him for their governor, but the leaders of the republican party did not think so, and consequently foreign aid was called in to control the popular will. Deputy marshals were appointed; United States supervisors were appointed, and the people were taxed to defray the expenses incurred in defeating them of their choice. All this was done under the false pretense of providing for a free and fair election.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, it so happened that I was absent from the Senate a few moments during the speech of the Senator from Indiana yesterday; and so also was my colleague, [Mr. HOAR.] On taking up the RECORD this morning I discovered that the Senator from Indiana had made such pointed allusions to the Senators from Massachusetts in the form of an interrogatory that without an answer there would seem to be an admission on our part that the statements made by the Senator from Indiana were correct. I do not desire to arraign the Senator himself for any misstatement, because I have no doubt that the Senator made the statement he did make upon what seemed to him to be proper authority; but he has been greatly misinformed.

I suppose that the Senator in speaking of the expenses of the election alludes to what was paid to deputy marshals in the State of Massachusetts at the last election, and it is very likely that he has stated the arithmetic correctly, that there were some $8,000 paid in Massachusetts to deputy marshals at the last election, and not as much as that paid to deputy marshals in the States lately in rebellion. I do not controvert that fact. Quite another kind of machinery controlled the elections in those States, and there seemed to be no disposition on the part of those who controlled to resort to any of the measures provided by law, but those elections were controlled in another way. On that point I have no question now. Whatever was expended in Massachusetts in the payment of deputy marshals was expended on the application first of the democratic party in Massachusetts for the appointment of those marshals. The distinguished gentleman who was the democratic candidate for Congress in the third district of Massachusetts made the application himself for the appointment of those deputy marshals, and they were finally appointed upon the joint application of members of both the republican and democratic parties, so that one as well as the other of the parties, so far as the expense is concerned, must take the responsibility.

The Senator goes further and does that which I desire to correct. He says they were appointed for the purpose of controlling the election, and that a distinguished gentleman of Massachusetts, General Butler, he says the people of Massachusetts had a right to elect governor but that certain republican leaders in Massachusetts thought otherwise, and that foreign aid was called in to prevent the people of Massachusetts from electing him their governor.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what answer he has to make to the question I put yesterday, was this use of Federal officers, deputy marshals, and supervisors of election necessary in the State of Massachusetts last year in order to secure a free and fair election for members of Congress in that State?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to answer it. I was trying to do so. The Senator seems not quite willing to let me answer it with that deliberation which I propose.

I have stated that the Senator has declared that this was done for the purpose of preventing the people of Massachusetts from exercising their free choice in the election of General Butler to the office of governor of Massachusetts. So far as the appointment of deputy marshals was concerned, I have stated that it was upon the application first of a democratic candidate for Congress in that State, and I have no hesitancy in saying that it was done on his part, and cooperated in on the part of the republican party in Massachusetts, for the purpose of obtaining a square, fair, and free election of members of Congress in the respective districts where application was made for the appointment of deputy marshals. The democratic party in Massachusetts, as well as the republican party, were entirely satisfied with the fairness of that election. They have made, so far as I know, no complaint of the fairness of that election. I think I am authorized by the only Representative of that party in Congress from the State to declare publicly here that that party as well as the republican believe that the election was a fair and free one. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that the effort of all good men of all parties in Massachusetts has been for a long time to secure a free and fair election in the State of Massachusetts, and never more, sir, than in the election to which——

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, I desire to renew my question——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. DAWES. I do not like to yield now. The Senator will allow me to get through.

Mr. President, I was saying that the effort of all good men of all parties in Massachusettes has been for many years to secure in that State a free and fair election. All legislation to which all parties are able to address themselves in the Legislature of that State touching elections has been for that purpose. No man of any party of any standing or reputation in Massachusetts will hesitate to aid the Senator from Indiana or any other man in an effort to bring to condign punishment, under the laws of that State, any man who has contributed in any manner whatever to prevent a full, free, and fair election in that State. They are ready to amend their laws, to make new ones in any way more stringent for the carrying out in good faith of that purpose; and that is as applicable to the democratic party in Massachusetts as to any other.

The distinguished gentleman in Massachusetts to whom the Senator alludes, whom he said the people of Massachusetts were prevented from electing (as they had a right to elect him) for their governor by what he says was unfair means, has never been able to show to the people of Massachusetts or to anybody else that any honest legal voter of Massachusetts was prevented from casting his vote for him. There was a very exciting canvass in Massachusetts last fall; but the effort on all sides was, not to prevent legal voters from coming to the polls, but to take care that every legal voter in that State should be impressed with the importance of that election—so much so that he would go to the polls and there discharge the duty of a citizen and express his will. That was done, and the result of that election was the expression of a full, free, and fair vote, more nearly than any other election for a long time, of every voter in the Commonwealth. There were candidates before the people there who were ambitious to be martyrs and who advertised for a first-class case of bulldozing or intimidation, and went about the State begging for some opportunity to bring a charge against somebody that there was to be intimidation at the polls; but it was an utter failure.

I say to the Senator from Indiana that every good man in Massachusetts will welcome the fullest and the fairest investigation of any committee appointed by this or the other branch of Congress into any instance of alleged intimidation of a voter, or depriving a legal voter of an opportunity to cast his vote in Massachusetts; and I repeat, sir, that every effort to apply the provisions of the law either of the United States or of the State of Massachusetts to that election in the appointment of marshals, in the discharge of their duties by those marshals after they were appointed, was in the honest and sincere effort on the part of those who made application for their appointment to secure a free and fair election of members of Congress for that State. The gentleman to whom he alludes as a candidate for governor had himself so much faith in that very law and in the appointment of marshals that he felt compelled to put more confidence in the results of their returns than in those of the State authorities themselves, and he governed his vote on the question in the House of Representatives by that consideration and by the confidence he had in and the importance he attached to the provisions and the duties of deputy marshals appointed for that purpose.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts concedes that the statement made by me yesterday as to the expenditure of money in his State as compared with the expenditure of money in the States lately in rebellion was correct.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt that the Senator, when he states a matter of arithmetic, states it on proper authority. I do not call that in question.

Mr. McDONALD. The authority I had for making that statement was the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to a resolution of the Senate calling upon the Secretary for information in regard to the expenses that had been incurred in the payment of special supervisors and general supervisors of election in the several States——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will be permitted to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Indiana leave to proceed?

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. No objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken in saying that the amount stated in that report related to the payment of special deputy marshals. It was the amount paid out, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the compensation of supervisors of election, the special supervisors, and that sum in exact figures as stated by him is $8,460; and it does not embrace the amount retained by the general supervisor of that State, he not having up to the time of this report made his return to the Secretary of the Treasury. Whatever the chief supervisor has charged and is entitled to receive or has retained out of the general fund in addition to that sum is to be added to the sum I have stated, while the amount paid out last year, 1878, in the States lately in rebellion was less than $6,000.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts has proven to be a most excellent witness in support of the proposition stated by me, and that is that this expenditure of money was not necessary in order to secure a free and fair election for members of Congress in that State. He has stated again and again that the State of Massachusetts was perfectly able, and that all parties—republicans and democrats—united in securing under their own laws a free and fair election; and it comes back to the question that I asked yesterday and propounded again to-day, which has not been answered: if it is not necessary for that purpose, under what pretense or by what right is the public Treasury taken and paid out in the State of Massachusetts for electioneering purposes?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ask, as the Senator puts his question to both the Massachusetts Senators, leave to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Massachusetts unanimous consent to proceed?

Mr. McDONALD. I think we might as well stop here.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator object to my answering the question which he has put to me?

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir, I do not. I did not put any question to the Senator from Massachusetts; I put it to his colleague.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Indiana——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will suspend.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Indiana waive the objection until I call his attention to the question put by him?

Mr. McDONALD. I withdraw my objection to the Senator proceeding.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senater from Massachusetts cannot proceed under the objection of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HOAR. A question has been put distinctly to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate, being the unfinished business, the bill (S. No. 206) relating to the transportation of animals.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question upon that is the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator from Massachusetts give way a moment that I may get an order?

Mr. HOAR. Let me get through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts can move to postpone the regular order.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to postpone it.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator can ask——

Mr. HOAR. I do not ask any pretended courtesy. I am entitled to the floor in my own right.

Mr. McDONALD. I apprehend I understand what courtesy is as well as the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Massachusetts to take the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon that he can speak on anything he sees fit to speak on.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I propose to do.

Yesterday, Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana put this question in my absence from the Chamber, speaking of the State of Massachusetts:

> Will her Senators in this Chamber say that this was necessary to secure a free and fair election of members of Congress?

I conceive, therefore, that the honorable Senator is in error when he says he has put no question which is addressed to me.

Mr. McDONALD. I said to-day I had put no question to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator will on reflection not say that he said "to-day."

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Massachusetts knows very well what my purpose was. What I had said yesterday I supposed his colleague for the State of Massachusetts had answered, and it was the question I put to his colleague to-day that I had in my mind.

Mr. HOAR. It is the same question the honorable Senator from Indiana put. While he is up I desire to withdraw any possible intimation that may have been contained in the use of the word "pretended" which I used just now. I am sure there is no Senator on this floor on whose courtesy I should rely with more entire confidence always than on his.

Mr. President, I desire to say in answer to this question that, in my judgment, as in the judgment of the republican and democratic leaders of the city of Boston, this appointment was a wise, prudent, and necessary measure to secure a full, free, and fair election of members of Congress. I do not mean to say that if this instrumentality had not been employed there might not have been found in the resources of the State other instrumentalities which would have answered the purpose nearly or wholly as well. But this was an election of members of the Congress of the United States, a national election, in which the nation is concerned, and there is upon the statute-book a law absolutely necessary in some portions of the country to secure honesty and fairness in such elections, but applicable alike to all quarters of the country; and, in my judgment, it was entirely proper that in the densely populated wards of the city of Boston the instrumentalities which the laws of the United States provide for the security of national elections should be invoked, and should be set in motion. It was in fact by the concurrent judgment of both parties; it was set in motion on the application of both parties, and it resulted to the entire satisfaction of both parties.

I think the honorable Senator from Indiana will agree that so far as I am concerned his question is answered. But I wish to make one more observation, and an observation which I make for the consideration of the democrats of the State which I represent especially and the democrats who know the condition of things in that State in general.

The Senator from Indiana came into the Senate yesterday with a carefully prepared written speech, which he read from a manuscript, a speech in support of a law on this subject, in the introduction of which he is, I suppose, the organ and representative of the democratic party of this country, if anybody can be so termed. He is a member and a distinguished member of a committee appointed by this body to consider abuses and frauds and irregularities in the elections. Now, in support of the change of the law which he and his party ask to be made, he has made two specifications, and only two, except what he has said about the city of New York in passing. First he says that this election law resulted in the expenditure of several thousand dollars for the city of Boston and in the expenditure of nothing (that is, there was no United States authority used) in the Southern States. So he holds up for himself and his party the example to mankind of the kind of election he and they want and the kind of election he and they do not want.

Mr. McDONALD. I can state to the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish the point, and I will yield.

Now I want the democrats of the New England States who know their own history, who desire the preservation of honest and constitutional government and honest and constitutional elections, and who are not in the least misled by any of this stuff which comes to the Senator from Indiana from his informant on the subject, to understand that the democratic party in future do not mean to have such elections as we had in the city of Boston in the year 1878 and in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts if they can help it, and they mean to have if they can bring it to pass such elections as we had in South Carolina and Louisiana and the other Southern States. The gentleman has made up his issue; he has put down his proof, he has specified, and he is to be held to his specification.

The democrats of the northern cities, many of them, are men of honor, men of property, men of business interests, men who have a large and important stake in the country, and they are looking with some interest to see what it is that this party propose to preserve, and what it is that this party of which the honorable Senator from Indiana is for this purpose the organ propose to overturn; and I say again I put the State election or the national election of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 1878 as my instance of what it is desirable to preserve, and the elections in those Southern States with which the United States Government did not interfere as his instance of what is desirable to preserve, and upon that issue we will go to the country.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has referred to two points which he says were prominently presented in the remarks that I made yesterday, and he draws his own deductions from them as to the kind of elections that the democratic party are in favor of. There was another reference made by me, and that was to the elections in my own State. I stated then that in our biennial elections we voted for every officer in our State, from the governor to the township trustee, and that these votes were cast upon the same ballot upon which members of Congress were voted for, and that every safeguard which was thrown around our own State election law for the election of our own State officers was thrown around the election of members of Congress in Indiana; and the Senator will find by an examination of the tables to which I referred him that no Federal money was expended in Indiana in the election last year. If he desires to know the kind of election I am in favor of I can tell him that I am in favor of just such elections as took place in that State by the free choice of the people of that State. And, Mr. President, when we cannot control our elections in the several States, when it becomes necessary to fasten this Federal machinery upon the country to control our elections by the emissaries of an administration, we might as well give up popular elections.

Mr. HOAR. Does not the Senator from Indiana understand that the national Administration is in this country? He talks about fastening the Administration on the country and going into the States. He might as well talk about himself going into his own fingers or going into his own knees. The national Administration is a part of this country; it is ever in the States which compose it; it pervades them; it is charged with the preservation of its life and its protection against fraud as well as against rebellion.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, what I mean is precisely this: that by this machinery which the gentleman and his friends insist on maintaining it is in the power of the Administration through its appointees to control almost every doubtful congressional district in the United States, and make the popular branch of the Government but a mere creature of the Administration. That is what I mean.

TRANSPORTATION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I hope we may go on with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 206) relative to the transportation of animals is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VOORHEES. I believe all this time there has been pending the motion which I had the honor to make yesterday to amend the bill introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] by striking out on page 7 between and including the lines 144 and 160, and I have risen to refer to the statements on the point involved in my motion, made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I suppose the cattle disease must be raging up in Massachusetts and that the United States deputy marshals and supervisors at the polls and the like are a method employed to correct and suppress that disease in the United States; otherwise I cannot account for the speeches which have been made by the Senators from that State. But aside from this I presume we are perhaps ready to take the vote upon this motion; if not, I hope it will be discussed and that we may proceed with the business in hand.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have no objection to striking out that portion of the bill proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to be stricken out. It was inserted in the bill for the reasons I have already stated; but I have no objection to striking it out, for I think the gentlemen interested in this particular part of the bill will perhaps find some other way of remedying the evils that now exist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is, on page 7 to strike out all from line 144 to and including line 160, as follows:

> And the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to appoint a skilled agent at each of the ports in the United States from which live stock and dressed animals are shipped, whose duty it shall be to inspect all animals designed for export, and, if found in good health, to give the owner or shipper a certificate (in such form as said Commissioner shall direct) stating that said animals were in good health at the time of shipment from said port; and said agent or inspector shall be entitled to and receive such compensation (not more than $1,500 per annum) as shall be fixed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, to be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That the Commissioner of Agriculture may prescribe, by regulation, such reasonable fees for inspection as he may deem just and equitable, to be paid by the owners of cattle exported under the provisions of this act.

Mr. EATON. I confess that I am opposed to striking this clause from the bill. I should desire to amend that part of the bill in several particulars, and when amended, it seems to me, it would become a valuable adjunct to the bill.

The reasons given by my friend from Indiana do not strike me with the same force that they doubtless did him. I do not believe that the western grower is to be imposed upon at all by this bill when it is properly prepared. I would not give the Commissioner of Agriculture this power at all; I would give it to the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint at such ports as he deemed advisable proper officers for this purpose; there would not be more than six. In my judgment, that would be all that would be necessary at the great shipping ports. It strikes me that by so doing, notwithstanding the long letter which was read from an eminent authority, the English would be better satisfied that our cattle sent there were proper cattle.

I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, and if that does not obtain, then I shall move to perfect this part of the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that if the section of the bill included between the lines named are stricken out, that will not prevent him from offering some other provision to meet the case.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Connecticut has stated that in his judgment there will be only five or six inspectors. This provision leaves it entirely optional with the Commissioner of Agriculture, as I understand it, whether he will appoint five or six, or five hundred or six hundred.

Mr. EATON. I admit that, and said I would place this power in the hands of the Executive of the United States to appoint for such ports as in his judgment it was advisable proper inspectors, and they would be the great shipping ports of New York, Philadelphia, perhaps Charleston, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston. Those are the great shipping points.

Mr. VOORHEES. There are three ports in Texas alone from which cattle are shipped. Now, the objection to the idea of the Senator from Connecticut is this: it has been demonstrated, if anything can be, by the paper which I read yesterday from Professor Law, that if you multiply these men by ten, taking as the basis of multiplication even those contemplated by this provision, and then allow them ten minutes apiece to each animal, they could not get through the inspection that is called for in one of the great ports like New York. In other words, it is not practicable. You will have to have an army of inspectors. What is an inspection unless it is what it is denominated? What is an inspection of an animal lasting five or ten minutes? Who are these men that are to be appointed? Are they men versed in the diseases of stock? You cannot find enough people in the United States who have scientific knowledge on the subject of cattle lung-fever to supply the places that would be required under this bill. There are not enough of them. They will be places for mere jobbers, perhaps political favorites, local bummers, lying around shipping ports to look at cattle and say whether they are diseased or not! What do they know about it? I am perfectly satisfied, after examining the paper that was read yesterday, that it requires men of science, and in fact it would require so many of them that there would not be enough of them in the United States to be found for the duty. After all, Professor Law's conclusion is the correct one: there is no way of meeting this evil except by exterminating the disease, going to the root of it, fighting the existence of the disease itself, and not allowing cattle that may have the lurking seeds of disease in them, alongside of some infected, to be passed by some unlearned, inexperienced fellow appointed inspector of cattle at $1,500 a year at some cow-yard. That is no inspection, and it would amount to nothing at all.

As I remarked yesterday, there is too much power in this movement to be placed in the hands of these men called inspectors. For my part I shall vote against every proposition that comes here increasing the numbers of Federal officers. We have too many of them now. They swarm in every direction. We are fighting a large number of them, and with all due respect to the Senator from Connecticut, for whom I have an habitual and real respect, it matters not to me whether these Federal officers spring from the Commissioner of Agriculture or from the President of the United States. I expect Commissioner Le Duc can appoint cattle inspectors about as well as President Hayes, and President Hayes about as well as Commissioner Le Duc. I take no stock in these proposed Federal officers, in some measure to interfere with and control and have an influence upon the local affairs of every shipping port. You clothe a man with Federal authority, give him a Federal office, and he at once blooms out like a big sunflower, a growth of more consequence in the garden of affairs than the State officials, and he is looked up to. If you give him authority about the cow-yards and the bull-pens of the country about the shipping ports he will with the power become very offensive. I hope the part to which I have called especial attention will be stricken out entirely. The Senator from Connecticut proposes to amend this provision so as to get rid of its obnoxious qualities. I do not think it can be amended. The amendment which he proposes to reduce the number would render it totally impracticable and make the inspection of cattle futile and of no manner of account.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I listened yesterday with a good deal of interest and some anxiety to the speech made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to see if there was any way in which I could support this bill, sympathizing as I do with the object of it, but up to this time I have been unable to see my way clear.

The clause now proposed to be stricken out, it seems to me, will do shippers of cattle no good and may do them great harm. I am glad the Senator from New Jersey agrees that it ought to be stricken out. The Senator from Indiana is right, in my judgment, in saying that any man the Commissioner of Agriculture might appoint or any man that any officer of the Government may appoint at $1,500 a year—that is the limit of the compensation he is allowed to receive—would be wholly unfit to perform the duties required of him in the important matters that he is required to act upon: but he might do great harm, and a bad man would positively have the power to ruin any person engaged in the foreign cattle trade. It would be in his power to wink at—for a consideration if you please—the fact that cattle were sick and allow them to be shipped, giving a health certificate; and it might be in his power for a consideration or for spite, to refuse a health certificate to men who had healthy cattle; and the man with the sickly cattle with the bogus certificate could go into a foreign market and absolutely destroy the sales of the man who really had healthy cattle. In other words, it would make bad men masters over the cattle trade from this country. It is a power that no fifteen-hundred-dollar-salary man ought to be intrusted with. Indeed the temptation is too great for the average official.

I doubt whether it is a subject of Federal interference at any rate. But my objection goes not only to that, but reaches to the bill itself. We passed an act in 1873, which I thought strained the authority of the United States to its utmost limit; at least I find this to be the fact that when that bill was passed, (of which this is only a modification, an extension perhaps,) embodied in sections 4386, 4387, 4388, 4389, and 4390 of the Revised Statutes, it failed to receive, as far as I can judge from the names, a single democratic vote either in the House or the Senate. Out of the seventy-one who voted against it in the House on the 8th day of April, 1872, nearly all were democrats; and in the Senate, looking over the list, I see that every democratic Senator voted against it.

This proposition, so far as I can understand the further proposed stretch of Federal interference in this affair, seems to be wholly for the benefit not only of the railroads but of the combinations that are formed by railroad managers inside of the corporations, and to the exclusion of their own stockholders. It compels cattle-owners to take off their stock at given points along the roads for given lengths of time; it forces them to put them into the pens at the stock-yards of the railroad companies, which are generally owned by combinations or corporations formed inside of the railroad companies themselves, generally by the directors who have the right and power under the proposed legislation to charge the men who are transporting stock any price they see fit for food and water because they are obliged to be put in pens, and the man who is transporting has no pens to put them in. The only pens in existence at the places where they stop are the pens owned by the corporations inside of the railroad corporations. While the shipper might buy feed from the farmer in the neighborhood, corn, if you please, at fifty cents a bushel, and hay, if you please, at $10 a ton, they can make him pay them a dollar and a half to two dollars a bushel for corn, and $20, $30, $40, and $50 a ton for hay. The owner of the cattle is obliged to pay it, and if he does not pay whatever they choose to ask they have a lien on his cattle and can hold them until it is so paid. These provisions are in further enforcement of existing law in the interest of the railroad directors and their-stock yard combinations, at least I am unable to see it in any other light.

I was in hopes that something would be done in this bill, if Federal authority is to be authorized to intervene at all, to limit the power of the railroad corporations or the stock-yard corporations in their exorbitant charges. If we are to interfere and can do so, which I doubt, I think we ought at least to say that when cattle are required to be taken off at stated periods or points on these railroads and fed, watered, and cared for, the owners shall either have the right to carry feed of their own or buy their feed where they please at the market price in the neighborhood where they are taken off, or that the railroad companies shall be obliged to furnish it to them at something like a rate corresponding with what they could buy it in open market for. There is where the great swindle to the transporter comes in. This bill not only does not remedy it, but it adds, as I understand, to the penalties of the existing law, making it even more stringent and more emphatic than existing provisions, because the existing law did give him some chance to buy feed outside, whereas I see none under the provisions of this bill.

If the United States is going to interfere for the benefit of commerce among the States, why should its interference not be to prevent the extortions of the great combinations of railroads through their own sub-corporations in the stock-yards? Perhaps they carry cattle at a cheap enough rate; but they make up their profits in the stock-yards and divide the profits thus made in these stock-yards, not among the stockholders of the railroad company, but among a few favored men who inside of the railroad corporations, perhaps directors, are making fortunes through the sub-corporations. If we are to intervene at all, why not require them in their transportation, if a man sees fit to carry his feed or can buy his feed from a farmer in the neighborhood at a reasonable price, to furnish it at something like that price, charging if you please a proper addition for the use of the stock-yards and the trouble they are put to, but something reasonable, not exceeding 25 per cent. above what it can be bought for in open market.

I hoped to see something of that sort in the bill; but I see no limitation, nothing to prevent all sorts of extortions, and I have no doubt that very many of the evils complained of, very much of the injury to cattle, grows out of the absolute necessity the shipper is under in order to get clear of these extortions on the way to press his cattle through as far as he can with as few stops as possible, and take as many risks as he can because it costs him less to take those risks than it does to permit these gross extortions.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question? He admits that these evils exist, that cruelty is practiced. I would respectfully ask the Senator if he deems it proper and right that these cruelties should continue; and if not, how he is going to reach them except by legislation? I am willing to admit that to some extent the extortions of which he complains may exist; but this bill does not propose to regulate in any shape or form the rates railroads shall charge for transportation, it does not propose to limit the prices of stock-yards along the route that a railroad shall charge; but it simply says that inhumanity shall not be practiced; you must treat the animals humanely, and we prescribe rules whereby you shall do so.

Mr. BECK. There is just my difficulty. Why take out of the State laws and place under Federal authority the subject of transportation between the States? Each of the States has endeavored to pass laws requiring within their own borders humanity in transportation, certain rests and time for feeding and watering, and the States are enforcing them within their own borders. Now, if we are going beyond that and seeking to enforce humanity in transportation by Federal authority ought we not simultaneously to prevent extortions while we are professing to encourage humanity? If we make the man who transports cattle act humanely by requiring him to take his cattle off to give them feeding time and watering time, if we have the power to do that, ought we not to put it out of the power of those who have the carrying of those cattle to extort from him improperly? By the same class of legislation that we compel the man who is transporting to do these things, can we not save the shipper from extortion? Ought we to leave him absolutely at the mercy of the men in whose hands he necessarily is? If we have the one power have we not the other power? And if we have both ought we not to apply both, because at last all the loss comes out of the man who produces the animal? The farmer suffers all the loss from these extortions and overcharges, because every man who buys from him, whether it be at Chicago or at Buffalo or anywhere else, buys with full knowledge of what he has to pay at every stock-yard, the risk he has to run, what he has to pay if he takes the stock over to England, what risk he has to run on the way because of embargoes on American commerce, and he reduces the orignal price he pays for the animal down to a point to cover all these things and leave some margin of profit after he has provided against them all. So at last it falls, and falls heavily, upon the man who raises the animal and who sells it to the first buyer, for every subsequent cost is taken out of the first price. I shall endeavor, if I can, to pass some law that will benefit the producer of the animal, because he is the meritorious man engaged in the honest employment of raising stock. Let him have it so transported to market, whether it is to England or to New York or anywhere else, transported to its ultimate destination, I repeat, so cheaply, so safely, so reasonably that the men who buy and who compete with each other will be able to pay him a living price for the animal which he produces and raises. At present that cannot be done, because of all of the various extortions and drawbacks which are systematically put upon him. It does not seem to me that this bill comes up to the measure of that relief at all. The Committee on Commerce may have done the best they can; I do not think they have; and if a motion is made to recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce with a view of having further examination and scrutiny of this whole question looking to the removal of extortions as well as inhumanity in transportation, I shall certainly vote to so recommit it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator from Kentucky he does not find fault with the provisions contained in this bill, but he thinks the bill does not go far enough. So far as regulating the prices charged by stock-yards or railroad companies are concerned, it was not the intention of the honorable committee reporting this bill to interfere or meddle with that matter; but I can say to the Senator for my part that I will go to any extent that he can go in that particular. I will willingly vote for any provision in this bill or any bill, which limits extortion at stock-yards or extortion in any manner in the live-stock transportation along the lines of railroad. I am perfectly willing that he should offer his amendments now—but I am very unwilling that this bill should be delayed any longer. I am perfectly willing to consider any amendments the Senator may offer.

I am very sorry that he took occasion to raise the point that when the original bill was considered in 1872, both in the House and in the Senate, it did not receive one single democratic vote.

Mr. BECK. It may have had one or two.

Mr. McPHERSON. I must differ from him in that particular, and in addition to that I am very sorry that the democratic party should take a position of that kind. I suppose the Senator thought in common with his democratic friends at that time that the bill was unconstitutional; but, sir, there are more constitutions than one to be considered in this matter. There is the constitution of the animal and the constitution of the consumer who eats the beef also to be considered; and the people of this country for the past five or six years have been earnestly praying Congress to enact some legislation by which these evils and cruelties should be put a stop to. This bill is a sort of compromise between the railroad interest, the live-stock shippers, and the humane societies of the country.

As I said before, bill after bill has been introduced into the Senate and the House which have been opposed by the railroad corporations of the country because they considered said bills to be unfriendly to their interests; and perhaps it is not necessary for me to say that for some reason best known to themselves the bills were defeated.

Now we come here to Congress with a bill which is a compromise between the railroad interests, the live-stock shippers, and the humane interests of the country. The railroad corporations say, "We will obey the law, we will make preparation for its strict observance, we will do everything in our power to secure the transit of live stock in a way whereby cruelty will not be inflicted, and whereby good, healthful food will be given the people." And the humane people of the country who have given this subject great attention also say, "We are perfectly satisfied with the provisions of this bill." It will, if observed, accomplish all we now demand or ever have demanded.

Now, the Senator from Kentucky says that the bill does not go far enough. He wishes to restrict the charges at stock-yards. In respect to that I have no objection. I will join with him in any proper effort in that direction. Let him prepare his amendment on that point while the other sections of the bill are being considered; and if it makes the bill more in the interests of justice—if it be fair and proper legislation—then I will join my humble efforts with his to accomplish the result aimed at by the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, Mr. President, I move to amend the bill on the first page, line 14, by striking out the word "eight" and inserting the word "four;" so as to make it read:

Shall confine the same in vehicles, railroad-cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a longer period than twenty-four consecutive hours without unloading the same for rest, &c.

Mr. McPHERSON. To this amendment I must most certainly object; and my reasons for objecting are these: It has been demonstrated beyond a doubt or peradventure that live stock can be kept in cars without cruelty to them for twenty-eight consecutive hours. When the bill was passed in 1873 to which this is an amendment, the time was fixed at twenty-eight consecutive hours. The railroad interest of the country, supposing that the bill would be enforced, commenced to make their improvements, their stock-yards, along the lines of the railroads, and they were located distant about twenty-eight hours running time one from the other. Now, it would be very ungenerous and very unfair, if no necessity exists for this change, to compel the railway companies to reconstruct, at different locations along the line of their roads, the expensive improvements necessary to care for animals. That is one almost insurmountable objection. These stock-yards cost large sums of money. To remove them from one point to another would be very inconvenient and very expensive.

In addition to that, they are now located at points where the railway companies have an abundance of water to give to the animals when they are taken from the cars, and there are not many points along the line of railroad where abundance of water can be secured for that purpose.

In addition to that there are other reasons, and, I claim, greater ones. If it is possible to confine cattle in cars for twenty-eight hours without unloading them for food and water without absolute cruelty, it is just and only just to the great cattle industry of the West that they should have the longest possible time to reach the great distributing points of the West from their pasture fields. For instance, take the State of Missouri. A producer of live stock in that State living twenty-four hours' running time distant from the city of Saint Louis, where the producer expects to market the cattle, could under the provisions of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Indiana reach Saint Louis within the twenty-four hours. A party living twenty-eight hours' running time distant from Saint Louis would be compelled to unload his live stock on the road between his residence and the Saint Louis market. If there is no necessity, if it is not cruelty to the animals to keep them in confinement for twenty-eight hours—and experience has proved that it is not cruelty to do so—why compel the party who lives twenty-eight hours distant from Saint Louis to unload his cattle, subjecting him to one day's delay, subjecting him to the cost of feeding them, keeping him out of the market which his more fortunate neighbor can legally reach, thus avoiding the cost of delay and also the competition of his more remote neighbor? Why subject the railroad corporations to this great expense of moving their stock-yards from points twenty-eight hours distant from each other to a point four hours nearer? It seems to me there is no necessity for it.

Besides, I wish to state another fact. As I have already said, this bill is a compromise. This is a matter which I wish the Senate distinctly to understand. The railroad interests which have fought this legislation for years are to-day in favor of it; in favor of it because public sentiment has demanded reform, and the only reform which will accomplish the result is in their judgment this proposed reform. Now, in making this reform they say we want to have the longest possible time consistent with humanity in which to reach our destination. For instance, the New York Central Railway, with its vast business, transporting perhaps a thousand or fifteen hundred carloads of live stock per week, cannot reach the city of Albany from the city of Buffalo in twenty-four hours, but it can reach that point in twenty-eight hours. The Pennsylvania Railway Company, which transports from a thousand to fifteen hundred cars of live stock per week, cannot reach the city of Philadelphia from Pittsburgh in twenty-four hours, but it can reach the city of Philadelphia in twenty-eight hours, or perhaps in twenty-six. Then why compel them to unload the live stock along the line of either of these roads unless it becomes absolutely necessary to do so to prevent cruelty to the animals? All experience shows it is not necessary. What is true in respect to the railroads named is true of all others.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, if I do not show the Senate from the testimony used by the Senator from New Jersey himself in his speech yesterday that even twenty-four hours is too long a time to keep cattle together in a car, either for their own comfort or for the health of the meat that is afterward sold, then I will yield to him on this point. I am aware, as a matter of course, that in transporting stock from one portion of this country to our seaboard suffering has to occur, and disease and death to stock to a certain extent, because our country is a vast one, and there is no way of escaping that. We can only modify and do the best we can to avoid the greater evil of such a system of transportation.

I take the speech of the Senator from New Jersey delivered yesterday, and I look at some of the facts cited by him in his very thorough speech. He quoted from an address of the president of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals made before the American Social Science Association in 1874. The Senator says in the remarks with which he has just favored us that by the law of 1873 twenty-eight hours is the limit during which stock may be kept on the cars, and because the railroads have accommodated themselves to that twenty-eight-hour system it would be wrong to change it, because it would be inconvenient for the railroad companies. I thought the convenience and comfort of the stock that was transported was the great object to be attained here, and that humanity to dumb beasts was our guiding motive rather than favor shown to railroad corporations. At the same time, I am not here to inveigh against railroad corporations. But the argument made by the Senator that because in 1873 we fixed the twenty-eight-hour system and the railroads accommodated themselves to that with water-tanks and stock-yards, we ought to continue it in the face of the cruelty that has been practiced under that system, is no argument at all to me. Now, I am going to show since the legislation of 1873 and under the twenty-eight-hour system what has transpired and how shocking are the details of cruelty to animals as exhibited by the Senator himself yesterday.

In the quotation which I have just spoken of, made by him from the president of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in 1874, I find the following:

First. That our eastern markets in both cities and towns are largely supplied with the meats of diseased animals, and to some extent with the meats of animals that have died of disease.

That is, under the twenty-eight-hour system adopted in 1873.

Second. That the eating of these meats produces disease in those who eat them and Third. That it is impossible to detect these meats after they have been dressed and put into the stalls.

Here is the important statement used:

It is estimated that about 6 per cent. of cattle and about 9 per cent. of sheep and swine, nearly six hundred thousand in all, annually die on the passage to market from the West, and a large portion of these are sold in our markets either as meat or rendered into cooking-lard.

Six to 9 per cent. of all the stock, cattle, sheep, and swine die under the system which the Senator from New Jersey is now contending for to keep them on the cars twenty-eight hours.

Again, the Senator yesterday quoted from a statement put forth by the Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals for the year 1874, and they say that operating under this twenty-eight-hour system—

Fifteen hundred dead animals arrived from Chicago in a single train in the early part of May last, having died upon the passage.

Is that a good system? Does that need no reform? The Senator is contending that the system which brought in from Chicago in a single train in the early part of May fifteen hundred dead animals who died on the passage ought to be continued, because to change it would inconvenience the railroads. It does not look to me so. He qualifies this by saying:

This was an extraordinary and exceptional case occasioned by a sudden change of weather.

It ought to have been supplemented by a sudden change of locality in those cattle; they ought to have been taken off the cars and given a chance to get out of the influence of the weather and get some rest.

The statement further says a bountiful supply of water during transit would have saved the lives of most if not all of these animals.

The same authority says further:

"Since Congress passed the act of 1872"—

Is that the same act the Senator alluded to, or I am wrong in quoting it as 1873?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is the amendatory act of 1873 to which I referred as making this a requirement.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then this must be a misprint:

"Since Congress passed the act of 1872 [1873] there have been numerous instances of cattle and hogs crowded into cars as closely as they could stand and carried through from Chicago to New York before unloading; and at other times cars have been unloaded in Pittsburgh, and soon after reloaded in other cars and run through to Philadelphia or New York, thus confined in cars from four to six days without food or water; (only nominally in Pittsburgh;) and the official reports show that between three and four thousand dead animals were taken from the two stations on one of the trunk-lines controlled by one company between Chicago and Philadelphia in the ten months following the passage of the law of Congress, besides the thousands that had their horns broken off, limbs broken, and were trampled upon and bruised in a barbarous manner, and really not in a healthy condition for human food."

I should like to break the horns off that railroad corporation; I should like to trample on it, and I should like to break its limbs, and I should like to put it to suffering. I will not stand here to mince matters and say it will be inconvenient to such a line of barbarians to build another water-tank, or another cow-yard. I propose, as far as I am concerned, when a subject of this kind comes before me, to reform in earnest. This is the system practised under the twenty-eight-hour provision as to confinement in the cars, contended for by my most respected and esteemed friend from New Jersey.

I might read a statement which is even stronger and more controlling from the Harrisburgh Telegraph, a newspaper of respectability, but I prefer to confine myself mainly to the statements of organized and responsible societies. In May last Hon. Mr. Cutler, from the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives—and I may allude to that for it occurred in a past Congress—submitted a report of the cattle inspector of the city of Buffalo made in and for the month of February preceding. Let us see what that is:

The report of the cattle inspector for the month of February was presented to the council by the city clerk on Monday last.

This was in Buffalo.

It contains figures showing the number of dead and crippled stock received at the Buffalo yards during the month the report covers. It is a matter that is not often brought to the notice of the public.

No, the humble poor of our own race are not often heard in their sufferings; and, when an animal is entirely dumb and has nobody to plead for it, its sufferings are generally passed over.

And yet there are facts—

Continues this report—

in it with which the people should be acquainted, and which will be very interesting, though perhaps not so easy or pleasant to digest.

Of dead cattle there were received 25; of dead sheep, 304; and of dead hogs, 748. Of crippled cattle there were 26; of crippled sheep, 197; and of crippled hogs, 926; making, in all, 1,077 dead animals and 1,149 crippled ones.

Over two thousand dead and crippled animals in one month in the city of Buffalo!

There are but two ways by which the meat of sick and crippled stock can be put into the market for table use. One way is by corrupting the cattle inspector, bribing him to pass the stock as all right, and the other by the selling of the meat to the retail dealers by those who make a business of buying dead, sick, and crippled stock after it has been condemned.

I think, Mr. President, I have shown that this system which the Senator in his kindness——

Mr. McPHERSON. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not wish to have him give the Senate an erroneous idea with respect to the reports he is reading from. If he will look down further he will see that the Buffalo cattle inspector uses these words:

The stock is loaded at Chicago and carried to Buffalo without a rest.
How long does it take to bring them from Chicago?
About thirty-eight hours if there is no delay.

This was in the month of February, a time when it is well known to everybody the roads were blockaded by snow. Instead of twenty-eight hours' confinement, I have no doubt the animals of which this inspector speaks had been upon the cars perhaps for one hundred consecutive hours without being either fed or watered. If the Senator undertakes to show that under the existing law allowing a confinement of twenty-eight hours these cruelties are practiced and this condition of things happened he is doing very great injustice to the report. So far as his injustice to my statement is concerned, I will answer that in due time; but I only ask that he will do proper justice to the gentleman who made this report. Instead of being on the cars twenty-eight hours, the stock was probably kept on the cars for more than one hundred hours. It is very safe for me to say I think, knowing something of the history of the matter, that this stock was on the cars from eighty to one hundred consecutive hours.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have done no injustice to any persons as far as I have gone, for I have only read what they have said themselves; and I think the statement of the Senator from New Jersey will not enhance our sympathies for railroad corporations or make us more tender in our regard for them in the necessary reforms, because, if I understand him aright, his statement amounts to this, that in the face of a law which required them to keep cattle upon the cars only twenty-eight hours they have been kept there about one hundred hours.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish the Senator would understand distinctly that it is the judgment of those perhaps as competent to judge as any member of this Senate, having been a long time engaged in the business, having given it a great deal of attention and observation, that it is not cruel to keep animals on the cars, if not overcrowded, for twenty-eight consecutive hours. Therefore all of the establishments which the railways have created along the line of their roads for feeding cattle are also in the interest of the western producer, who desires as much time as possible to reach the distributing point and still not treat his stock cruelly. I claim that as a matter of policy and justice, as well as of expediency, it is well to leave the law as it stands, for the difference between twenty-eight and twenty-four hours is not very great; and it is much less cruel in a case of this kind to let the stock run through for twenty-eight hours than to change the time to twenty-four hours, particularly as two reshipments must be made in a twenty-eight-hour run. Let me illustrate: suppose, for instance, that the Senator starts a car-load of cattle from Buffalo to Albany; after he has run his cattle for twenty-four hours he must then unload them to be fed and watered, provided the bill be amended to suit his view of the case. Now, by running four hours more he would reach the city of Albany. Remember they must be driven out of the cars, and they must be driven back in the cars when reloaded. They must be detained at that point, and then the next run is only for four hours more, to wit, Albany, which is a great market and distributing point for buyers from New York and all the Eastern States. The stock must necessarily be unloaded from the cars at that point to exhibit to the purchaser. It is my opinion the animals would suffer a greater injury to pursue the course recommended by the Senator from Indiana than to confine them in cars four additional hours. If the Senator will only reflect I know he will agree with me.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me I should like to put a question to the Senator from New Jersey. Do I understand the Senator to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, yes.

Mr. PADDOCK. Do I understand the Senator to say that whether the rule be twenty-four or twenty-eight hours the length of time required for shipment, for instance, from Saint Louis to New York, would be the same in either case? That I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think it would be the same.

Mr. PADDOCK. Then why the objection to twenty-four hours?

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator from Indiana will yield to me to give a reason I will do so. The railroad corporations of the country of course run all their trains in a manner to make the most money. It is a well-known fact that on railroad trains running at the rate of ten miles per hour freight can be afforded much cheaper, and the compensation for doing the labor would be much cheaper than if running at the rate of twenty miles an hour. Therefore railroad companies run their stock trains at low rates of speed and give a corresponding rate of freight to their patrons. If there is any way of controlling the speed of a railroad train or controlling the freight compensation by Congress, then the Senator's question is a very proper one. But this bill contemplates no such thing.

Mr. VOORHEES. In one single observation of the Senator from New Jersey I heartily concur, and that is that railroads generally run their trains to make the most money. The statement made by him a few moments ago was to the effect that those who knew perhaps more on this subject than either of us had decided that it was no greater suffering for cattle to be confined twenty-eight hours in the cars than twenty-four. I am fortunate in this little talk this morning for I only have referred to the Senator's speech of yesterday when he was full of the subject of cattle suffering, and he quoted authority sufficient to arm anybody in a discussion of that point. I find that in his speech of yesterday he quoted a portion of the report of the New York cattle commissioners in 1869. Let us see what they say on the subject of the duration of travel. These cattle commissioners, making a report to the Legislature of the State of New York, I presume filled the description which the Senator gave of those who knew more on this subject than either he or I. I am willing to take it that way. I know they know more than I do, and I think they know more than he does. I say it with the utmost respect. This report proceeds to say:

> Under the most favorable circumstances and conditions of treatment, stock shipped from the West by railway endure such suffering and torture as would of necessity destroy the lives of human beings placed under similar treatment. Any one who has been compelled to stand for half an hour in a straggling, surging crowd of men, pressed, whirled, and crushed in its eddies, without power to extricate themselves, may imagine the sufferings and conditions of the cattle in a loaded car, as they are jammed together and jerked over our railways. Lengthen out this misery for an hour or two and it becomes intolerable, but continue it for hours—a whole day together with a long night—and only the strongest natures could survive the treatment.

That is, twenty-four hours.

> During this twenty-four hours of agony they are without a morsel of food or a drop of water.

It does not say it would be good for them to keep on for twenty-eight hours; it does not say it would alleviate their sufferings to keep them four hours longer. These cattle commissioners, who I think knew this subject better than either of us here, seemed to be of opinion, if their language can be taken to express what they mean, that twenty-four hours are that many hours of agony on the cars, without a morsel of food or a drop of water. They proceed to say:

> A broiling sun may be pouring its rays down until the air seems stifling and suffocating. Their agonized fellows, frantic with misery, press and surge against them in endeavoring to gain relief from the horrid pressure, and the horns, whether they will or not, wound and tear and score each other in the crowd, to which suffering is added the inevitable goad of the attendant, necessary, yes, absolutely necessary, to prevent the trampling to death of some of the number.

Let us see what the next paragraph says, quoted by the Senator himself who now pleads for twenty-eight hours because it would inconvenience the railroads to change it to twenty-four:

> At the end of the twenty-four hours they are sometimes removed, and their feverish thirst is slaked by large draughts of water, and they lie down to rest, eating but little, for they are positively sick.

I do not think they would be any better at the end of twenty-eight hours.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Had you not better make it twelve hours before you get them into the bad fix of twenty-four?

Mr. VOORHEES. I would make it less than twenty-four rather than more than twenty-four. I prefaced the remarks I made by stating, just as the report of these cattle commissioners states it, that much suffering has to be undergone by this mode of transportation. The question is to find where we are to stop, and how to define this transportation, so as to inflict as little misery upon these dumb animals as possible, and at the same time transport them to their destination:

> Off the cars for twenty or twenty-four hours—just long enough for their punctured wounds to fester and their injured frames to become sore and stiff—when they must be reloaded to pass through another twenty hours of the same agony, only aggravated by the wounds and soreness of the bruises they have before received; and so, day after day, for five, ten, or fifteen days, they live and suffer on their passage to the market.

These commissioners proceed to add that:

> Although it is to be hoped that the several States west and south of us will do their whole duty in the matter of enacting such laws regulating the stock trade and transportation as may be needful within their own boundaries, the State of New York should, irrespective of their action, do its whole duty to itself and people. Our population is rapidly increasing. We must receive the bulk of our meats from the West. It is indispensable to the health of that population that these meats should be wholesome and of good quality. It is an imperative duty, so far as the law-making power is concerned, to render them as much so as possible, and the commissioners would fail in a grave and solemn duty did they not present all the facts and circumstances to the consideration of the Legislature.

The Senator from Iowa suggests, by way of criticism I apprehend, why not make the time twelve hours? If we were dealing entirely with the comfort of the animal we would not transport him from his pleasant meadows at all; we would leave him to crop the grass and die in comfort at home. If we were not depending on him for our subsistence we would never slaughter him. He has to be slaughtered to feed the world; he has to be transported, and the question is whether we shall inflict upon him the suffering of a thousand deaths needlessly before he dies the actual and necessary death, in order to accommodate corporations that seem not to have obeyed the law as it stands, and who in the face of a law that compelled them to unship at the end of twenty-eight hours have, according to the reports that I have read here, kept them upon their cars instead of twenty-eight hours, according to the admission of the Senator from New Jersey, perhaps one hundred hours. That is the question here, if in the face of a law compelling these railroads to give the brutes rest at the end of twenty-eight hours, such horrible, indescribable suffering as is reported here by these societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals should be permitted? It should arrest the attention of everybody and appeal strongly, not merely for the reduction of the time that stock may be confined upon the cars, but for stringent legislation to compel obedience to these laws.

I was not aware until I was on my feet this last time that there had been such absolute, reckless disregard of the laws on the statute-book for the last six or seven years; in fact, I was not aware that in the face of the law of 1873, requiring the unshipment of stock at the end of twenty-eight hours, they had been kept on the cars three, four, five, or six days together. I was not aware that there were any corporations in this country so bloated and arrogant as to treat the laws of the country as if they held them in utter contempt.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator will allow me to call his attention to the proviso on page 3, he will discover that it is proposed in a certain contingency now to continue cattle in cars during sixty consecutive hours.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have not come to that yet. One section at a time is enough for me.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest this in order that the Senator may emphasize his criticism in regard to the twenty-eight hours at the same time.

Mr. VOORHEES. Whereabouts is that?

Mr. PADDOCK. On page 3, line 52, the first proviso is, and the second one is in line 56.

Mr. COCKRELL. That sixty hours applies where they are fed and watered on the cars.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will read the proviso to which I refer.

Mr. VOORHEES. I see it now. I believe I have said all that I desire at this stage of the discussion to say upon this question. It may be that it is regarded by some as a subject of not much moment where we are legislating for those not of our own species. We have been talking about political rights, personal rights, and personal liberty so long that it may be that we have somewhat obscured in our feelings the claims which God's dumb creation has upon us. So far as I am concerned, however, I believe those sentiments are alive in my breast, and I hope they will continue so.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, the question under consideration is really an important one to some portions of the country, and I think to all portions of it. It certainly is the interest of the people in the region of country where I live, where cattle are raised largely, to have them as carefully handled and brought to market in as good condition as can be done. It is also the interest of those who receive them and use them to have them brought to them in as good condition as can be. The practical question is, how can that best be done? The particular proposition now is to change the requirement of the present bill and the present law, as I understand, from twenty-eight hours to twenty-four hours as the time during which animals may be confined upon the cars.

The Senator from Indiana has spoken very eloquently of the sufferings of these animals confined as they are for transportation. There is doubtless much suffering; and with those who see cattle thus transported at the end of their journey, I think erroneous opinions prevail as to the causes of that appearance. Very frequently I am inclined to think—I know something about this matter—the wounds spoken of as shown at the end of a journey are suffered at the time when the animals are placed upon the cars, in the loading, in the crowding together of fourteen to sixteen bullocks in a car, pushing them through a narrow chute upon each other in the car. Very often these wounds that are spoken of are inflicted by one upon another during that process, and do not arise at all from the transportation afterward. It has so happened to me that I have loaded a good many cars of bullocks myself, and know something about it.

Again, an animal will get down, as it is called, in transportation; he may not have been five hours in the car; he will get down in the bottom of the car, lie down and be trampled upon by those about him, and until the next station is reached it is impossible to do anything for him. If an animal gets down between two stations nothing can be done until the next station is reached, and then the owner, if possible, may get him up; but very likely before the next station is reached he will be ruined, perhaps killed.

Again, a good deal has been said about the numbers of animals that have died on particular trips or particular occasions, both of bullocks and hogs. That frequently occurs from a change in the weather. In the winter time you may load a dozen cars with hogs and place in each car what is supposed to be a proper number, and before they reach their destination there is a change from moderate to exceedingly cold weather, and they pile upon each other, as the technical term is, and smother each other to death because of the cold.

Again, during moderate and pleasant weather in the spring or summer you load a car with the proper number of hogs as is supposed, and it becomes exceedingly hot by a change of weather, and they smother. You cannot avoid these things, and these losses do not grow out of the length of time they are upon the train.

I am strongly inclined to believe that it would not be wise to change the existing law. I think the railroads in Iowa have adapted themselves to the law as it exists, and have built expensive cattle-yards and accommodations at twenty-eight hours' run. I do not believe, from what knowledge I have upon the subject, that the change from twenty-eight to twenty-four hours would make any material difference either in the comfort of the animals or in the condition in which they would arrive at their points of destination, and I do believe that to make the change would inflict a serious loss upon the railroad companies in requiring them to change their arrangements made under the requirements of the existing law. I am not understood where I live to be the special advocate of railroad companies; but justice should be done to them as well as to others of our people.

My own conviction after a good deal of study of this subject is that the true solution of the whole matter—and we shall come to that after awhile—is that our meats will be slaughtered where they are grown and they will be sent forward as they can be then in just as good condition as they are when taken from our pastures; and until that shall have been done I do not believe our eastern people who eat our western beef will have it as good as I would like them to have it and as I would like to have it myself.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana appears to be laboring under a very great misapprehension with respect to the reports, several of which I read yesterday, and I think perhaps I can correct the impressions that those reports have given to him by making a statement. He goes on the supposition that the law of 1873 has been enforced, that it has been observed. Now, the facts are that the law has never been observed. The facts are that transportation of cattle from the West to the East ever since that law was passed has gone on as though no law existed. The law has not been observed, because it was faulty and inoperative. Live stock have been shipped from the West to the East without taking them from the cars at all, save perhaps only nominally at Pittsburgh or Buffalo. Stock have been shipped from Chicago and Saint Louis directly through to New York without either food or water, and therefore the great dissatisfaction with the condition of the animals. What these commissioners have commented upon, and what the humane societies have reported upon has been the fact that the stock has not been cared for at all, not that they have been on the cars twenty-eight hours, but that they have not been properly fed and watered.

The railway corporations themselves are not any more to blame perhaps than the shippers. The shipper, if he gives the order, can at any time remove his stock from the cars and feed and water them. The railroad companies will not object to it; and therefore the railroad companies are not more to blame than shippers. But there appears to be a general disregard of law, in fact there is no law that is operative and that can be enforced. We therefore desire to amend the sections of the Revised Statutes so as to enable us to enforce obedience to the requirements of the law. I think, sir, that it is altogether unnecessary, and it would be impolitic and unwise to change the time from twenty-eight to twenty-four hours; it would be unwise so far as the great producing interest of the West is concerned in reaching the first distributing point where they sell their stock mainly to the eastern buyers, it would be unwise to the railway corporations that have provided these facilities if there is no good reason, no earthly necessity why it should be done; which I claim there is not. Therefore I hope the amendment of the Senator from Indiana will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. MORRILL. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 14, after the word "twenty," it is proposed to strike out "eight" and insert "four;" so as to read:

For a longer period than twenty-four consecutive hours without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana should also include the word "eight" in line 23 of the bill, so as to make it conform.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That would necessarily follow if the pending amendment be agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. That would follow of course, but I supposed it might be taken as one amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to strike out after the word "rest," in line 59, the remainder of the paragraph, in the following words:

And it shall be the duty of all railroad companies or persons operating any railroad within the United States, to give cars loaded with live-stock the right of way over all other trains except passenger trains.

The reason why I move this amendment is because in some sections of the country where there is not very heavy railroad business, there are what are called mixed trains, composed partly of passengers and partly of freight. I suppose that trains of such a character would be compelled under the bill to give the right of way to cars loaded with live stock, as the clause provides that over all trains except passenger trains cars carrying live stock shall have the right of way.

Then, there are other interests that would suffer, for instance the transportation of perishable fruits, now a very considerable interest in this country, and time is absolutely necessary in order that they may be conveyed profitably to market. Trains carrying perishable fruits would, under the clause which I propose to strike out, be compelled to go on a switch and give the right of way to a train carrying live stock, greatly to the detriment of the persons interested in the transportation of perishable fruits. That is a very considerable interest in my State as well as in other States. We are sending fruits throughout the whole country, as far west as Chicago and as far north as Maine, and to all intermediate points. Sometimes we have sent as high as two hundred car-loads of fruit alone to the city of New York in a day. It is therefore a very considerable interest, and any detention whatever greatly deteriorates the value of the fruit that is shipped.

I do not think that this provision which I move to strike out is a wise one. That matter had better be left to the regulation of the railroad companies which are transporting live stock and transporting mixed trains of passenger and freight and also perishable fruits, as such matters fall within their line of duty. I hope, therefore, that the clause will be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I fully agree with the Senator from Delaware as far as he has gone, but there are a few additional reasons why I think the clause should be stricken out. This is, I believe, one of the new features not in the law as it now exists, and perhaps it is the most important new feature ingrafted in the present bill that is not in the original law. I greatly prefer the original law as it now stands to the present bill. I think the Senator who has the bill in charge will admit that the bill would make very little difference in the law if the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware should prevail and that clause be stricken out. What does that clause provide? It provides that it shall be the duty of all railroad companies to give these cars the right of way, it matters not if they are but ten miles long, or if they are altogether in a single State:

And it shall be the duty of all railroad companies, or persons operating any railroad within the United States, to give cars loaded with live stock the right of way over all other trains except passenger trains.

That goes further than anything that ever has been claimed yet from either side of the Chamber. It applies to a road, if there should be such a road, that is only one mile long in a single State, and it certainly includes all roads in the country, any railroad and all roads. It controls entirely the running of the trains and how they shall run.

Mr. President, if the General Government can go into a State and control how a train shall be run in the least particular, no matter what it is, then it can go through all the details and regulate who shall run it, who shall be employed, how fast it shall run, when it shall run, and all other things connected with it.

I hope the Senator from New Jersey after reflection and hearing what the Senator from Delaware has said, as well as what little I have said, will not insist upon that part of the bill. It certainly is the most objectionable to me of all the provisions of the bill, and more objectionable than I should suppose the Senator himself would have thought of adding to the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON rose.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I see the Senator from New Jersey who has charge of the bill is ready to say a word. I wish to ask him without going further myself (although I have considerable to say if there is any probability of this clause remaining in the bill) to tell us what advantage the present bill has over the existing law, and why it is that he wishes the existing law altered in this particular.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to allow me, if it is in order, to offer an amendment which I think will obviate the objection in part.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. An amendment to this particular paragraph?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; to this particular clause.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in order, of course.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not make any question of order.

Mr. TELLER. I move, after the word "States," in the sixty-first line, to insert:

Whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals are conveyed from one State to another.

So as to read:

And it shall be the duty of all railroad companies, or persons operating any railroad within the United States, whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals are conveyed from one State to another, to give cars loaded with live stock the right of way over all other trains except passenger trains.

That will obviate part of the objection made by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And only a part.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from West Virginia asked me to reflect. I have reflected, and the more I reflect the more I am convinced that Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce and even to the extent that the Senator says we may be able to do if this point is conceded. But with respect to this particular amendment I shall not be very strenuous in insisting upon it. It is a new thing ingrafted upon the bill; the original law contains no such provision. The Senator from Delaware has made some objection of a character which perhaps might be very forcible, particularly in his own State. I can see perhaps an objection to giving live stock the right of way over property perhaps more perishable, for instance fruit on its way to market. If it should be forced to lay upon a side track in order to enable cattle trains to pass, the result perhaps might be very injurious to that peculiar kind of freight.

Therefore, I shall not insist upon retaining this clause in the bill, although I think it is no more than right and just that railway companies should by some means or other be compelled to give live stock, property that is a perishable property, property that is of course subject to depreciation, to deterioration, and to suffering, the right of way over inanimate freight. They pretend now to do it. They pretend to run their stock trains faster than they run other freight trains, but it is more a matter of convenience with them than one of strict policy. But inasmuch as this clause does not concern practically the features of the bill that are most necessary to secure the end we have in view, I will consent to striking it out.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be agreed to. While I think there should be preference given to a train loaded with live stock over trains carrying merely merchandise, privilege ought also to be extended to a certain extent in giving the preference to trains loaded with merchandise that is perishable, although it is not susceptible of suffering as live-stock freight is. If it is right to enact the other clause of the bill in order to prevent suffering in this character of freight, it is also right that the clause should be stricken out for the same purpose. I therefore want it stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understood the Senator who has charge of the bill to consent that the whole clause be stricken out. Is there objection to that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That does not control the action of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I merely ask now if there is any objection to it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that an amendment is proposed to the amendment which I offered?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Colorado has moved to perfect the text, and then I understand it will be in order to strike out the whole clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to amend the part proposed to be stricken out always takes precedence.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the amendment of the Senator from Colorado should be adopted, is it competent then for the Senate to strike out the whole clause?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. TELLER. My purpose, of course, is to make that portion of the bill as little objectionable as possible, and confine it strictly to interstate commerce, if we interfere at all.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to my amendment is adopted it will then be competent to strike out the whole clause as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will then recur on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to strike out the clause as amended. The pending question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to strike out the clause as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A moment ago I asked the Senator from New Jersey who has charge of the bill to be kind enough to explain the difference between the bill and the law as it now exists. I called the attention of the Senator specially to the proviso between line 52 and line 59, which relates to a special kind of car that might be put upon the roads or that might be built for the purpose of transporting cattle; and then, with that particular car sixty hours, instead of twenty-eight hours, may be the time during which cattle are kept upon the cars. It has been intimated to me, though I know nothing of it myself, and I submit it to the Senator, that such a provision would cause probably all the railroads to go to work pretty soon to rebuild or make new cars, which would be very expensive, and not only very expensive to the railroads, but it would cause considerable delay; and it may be that some special road now has this particular kind of car, and would become the beneficiary of this act. I ask the Senator whether there is anything in that?

Mr. McPHERSON. I stated yesterday when I addressed the Senate, as I supposed the Senate wished to know particularly in respect to that phase of the question, that certain railroad companies have an improved car; that there are some sixty different devices in the shape of cars that are considered improvements upon the present method, and there are no patents that are necessary for railway companies to use or employ; that a perfect and complete car in all its appointments can be constructed and placed upon the road without one particle of royalty or charge to any person for their use.

In respect to the use of the car I wish to inform the Senator that during the past two or three years several of the railway companies have placed improved cars upon their roads as a test to see if live stock could be transported for long distances without removing them from the cars. The experiment has proved a great success. Live stock are shipped to-day from Saint Louis and Chicago through to New York in these improved cars without removing them from the cars at all to feed or water them, and it is better for the stock than the system now in use. It is an experiment which has been tried and found to be one of utility and of great advantage. In relation to an inquiry the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] made of me yesterday, as he appears to be very desirous upon the question of being relieved from the impositions of stock-yards, I will state that all of these cars that have been constructed and have been tried have receptacles that contain the food. They have facilities along the line of the railroad for giving the live stock water about every hundred miles of the road. They are given food as often as the animal requires it.

Therefore it is much better than the present mode, by which live stock could not either get food or water under twenty-eight hours. They could be run for twenty-eight consecutive hours before reaching a feeding station; but under the improved method they would be fed and watered about every hundred miles of the road, and therefore never become hungry or thirsty to an extent that cruelty is inflicted upon the animal.

In respect to the competition, as I stated yesterday to the Senator from Kentucky, the food that is placed in these cars is placed there by the producer of the stock. The car is run on to his own farm or some station contiguous to it. He removes the corn from his own field, the cattle from his own pasture, places them together in the car and starts them for the market. The corn is fed to his cattle along the route, and it only costs him what it costs to produce it; while if the Senator from Kentucky is not in error with respect to the extortion practiced by stock-yards it costs about as much to pay the excessive charges of the stock-yards as to pay the freight upon the animals. It is to relieve the great public from these excessive charges that we seek to provide the improved cars in which the stock can be transported.

The Senator asks me another question. He asked why a difference should be made in respect to the time in which the animals should be fed. My answer is this: if you give animals food and water then there is no suffering attendant upon their transportation; but the existing law permits them to be shipped for any number of hours. There is no limit to the time in the existing law, if they are fed and watered, in which they may not be kept in confinement. This bill proposes that the time shall be limited to sixty hours instead of shipping them an unlimited number of hours without rest.

As I was saying to the Senator from West Virginia, there have been thousands of cars of live stock shipped from Saint Louis to Chicago during the past year directly to New York, Philadelphia, and Boston that have never been unloaded from the cars at all. I speak whereof I know when I say that those animals have come into market under the system of improved cars and that the shrinkage upon the animals has not been one-half as much as upon animals transported by the present erroneous system.

Therefore we have many objects in view: first, to get to market as rapidly as possible, to expedite the transit, to save the producer all extortionate charges for feed furnished by the stock-yards, and to save the shrinkage upon the animal, and also prevent cruelty in transportation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It occurs to me that this proviso is a dangerous one. Who is to be the judge of what kind of car the animal shall remain in sixty hours? Then there is to be a car on which the animal is to remain twenty-eight hours.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. In any kind of a car that contains facilities to feed and water the stock they may remain sixty hours.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then there is no use of the proviso. With some knowledge of railroading, I say that in any car whatever cattle can be fed and watered. I do not think there is any car in which cattle may not be fed or watered, but they may not always be properly fed or properly watered. It may be done in an imperfect manner, but it can be done, and has always been done.

Mr. McPHERSON. They must have "daily proper food and water."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the very point. Who is to be the judge of the "proper" manner? The clause to which I refer is mischievous. If we must say that twenty-eight hours is the time, we ought to specify the special kind of car, and somebody somewhere has got to be the judge. The railroad company must be the judge, or all the time the animals must remain sixty hours. If some of the roads are to be the judge, probably they will say sixty hours, because they will try to get the car through just as rapidly as possible.

My friend has just said that the shrinkage is one-half less than over the old system. Will not the drover, the person having charge of the cattle, or the owner select the best cars? Mr. President, it is my impression that this whole matter ought to be left to competition. It ought to be left to the people and the railroads themselves, because the owner of the cattle will go to that road which treats them best and takes the cattle through in the most perfect order, as you and I would do in any business transaction.

My opinion is that there never ought to have been any act of Congress on this subject, but there is now one existing. I do not see, and I have tried to see, that the present measure would improve the existing law. In my opinion it will not. On the contrary I think it will not operate as well as the present law. My impression is that this bill ought not to pass in any shape. Why? It is a question, and a grave question, whether Congress has a right to go into any State and regulate the movements of trains on its railroads, or any other matter in regard to which the State has a law, and I understand that nearly every State has laws regulating this subject. If the State has the right to act, then the General Government has none; if the General Government has the right, then the State has not. The citizens of the little State from which I come and which I in part represent would rather have the regulation of their railroads in their own hands than to have Congress regulate them, because they know better what they want. A hundred persons in the Legislature of my State would rather legislate themselves than to leave the matter to Congress or to their five representatives in the two Houses of Congress. In my opinion it is better for them to retain the power there than to transfer it to the General Government. It is much easier for them to regulate and control their roads than it is for the General Government to undertake to control all the railroads in this country.

To show how far this is likely to go, the Senator from New Jersey has just consented that a provision might be stricken out which applied to every railroad in the country. No matter whether it was entirely in a State, though the road might be only ten miles long, it claimed the right to control that road and the running of its trains.

Mr. McPHERSON. It does still.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator says it does still. That makes it so much the worse for the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. No; but I have not surrendered the right.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator says he has not surrendered the right to go into a State where the road is entirely in a single State and control it. Now, if he can control it in one particular he can control it in all particulars. The admission of the Senator now that he believes the General Government has a right to take a road that is entirely in one State and control it is enough, in my opinion, to show us that we ought not to take another step in the direction this bill goes.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, that is certainly the most incomprehensible argument I have ever heard. I have never argued nor do I argue now that it is within the power of Congress to go into a State where both ends of the railroad are within that State and to undertake to regulate or control commerce confined to the limits of the State that can be done and done only by State law. I refer solely to interstate railroads engaged in commerce between the States.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask whether or not the bill did not include all railroads? It provided:

> And it shall be the duty of all railroad companies, or persons operating any railroad——

Mr. McPHERSON. "Within the United States," forming any part of a line over which commerce from one State to another is conducted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is not the State within the United States?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly. The section to which the Senator refers was amended by making it apply to interstate railroads.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am speaking of what the Senator's bill was.

Mr. McPHERSON. So far as the control of the State in this matter is concerned, I have one remark to make. The humane societies of the different States in this country have petitioned State Legislatures year after year to pass restrictive laws by which this matter could be controlled, but I find in very many of the States in this Union the railroad corporations are a great deal the strongest power which resides there. The result has been that in many of the States no legislation has been made in respect to this subject. There are to-day no more than three or four States which have passed laws regulating the transportation of animals. It is for that reason that Congress is appealed to and petitioned to pass laws to correct the evils in the live-stock transportation upon the long routes between the West and the East.

With respect to the car question of which the Senator appears to have a fear, I wish the Senator now to pay strict attention to what I have over and over repeated. We start upon this proposition: cruelty is practiced in the transportation; the railroads admit it; the public charge it; humane societies petition Congress to reform it. How do we propose to reform it? We have a system by which we are transporting live stock and we say the animals must be removed from the cars every twenty-eight hours for food and water. But the shippers say we have a better plan. What better plan? We can furnish an improved car so that the animals can be fed and watered. The railway companies say, while we admit the cruelty we are willing to improve our cars. It would cost us much less to improve the cars than it would to provide the necessary facilities in any other way. While there are a hundred different devices that might be employed, a hundred different ways by which the cars may be improved, will the Senator please take the bill and show me that there is any requirement that any particular cars shall be used, or that any car at all shall be used? The provision is simply this, provided, however, if you do employ a car in which to feed and water the animals while in transit and you do give them food and water while in transit, then the provisions of the law requiring them to be unloaded shall not apply. It seems to me that it is a very far-fetched argument to say that there is any patent car or any patent thing about it. There is no requirement that the railroad companies shall ever put an improved car upon their roads at all, but we say to them, if you do not put the improved car upon your road you shall be humane and you shall remove your stock from the car and feed and water them at least after every twenty-eight consecutive hours, because humanity and good meat food demand it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. On that point I wish to ask the Senator a question. The Senator avoids my question as to who is to be the judge of the particular kind of car on which the live stock is to be transported. That is the question I put to him.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will read the proviso, and then I will ask the Senator if it is possible by any use of words to make a thing plainer:

> Provided, however, In all cases when animals in transit from one place to another be transported in cars, boats, and other vessels in which said animals do have daily proper food and water, the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply.

"Proper food and water." I care not how they do it. They may put a pail inside of the car at every station containing water and containing food, but that perhaps would be a very antiquated method. I should think perhaps that American ingenuity and enterprise might devise some other and better mode, and I believe it has done so. But if it is done, if the animal does get proper food and water, as the bill provides, that is all that is demanded. Now who is to be the judge? I think if the Senator from West Virginia were engaged very largely in live-stock transportation he would be a very good judge whether the stock was fed and watered properly. I think the Senator understands managing his own business in other respects pretty well, and I think he would be an excellent judge.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the very point. I think you had better leave it to them; let the owners of the stock be the judges.

Mr. McPHERSON. We do.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And not confine them in anything.

Mr. McPHERSON. We do not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In other words, why pass this bill? Let them be their own judges.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator inform me in what way the owner of the stock would not be the judge?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then why do you want to pass the bill?

Mr. McPHERSON. If you start from Saint Louis with a train loaded with cattle, there upon one side track are improved cars, there upon another side track are the cars now in use. The Senator from West Virginia may elect as between those cars which he will employ. If he elects to use the cars in use at the present day the bill says, if you do not feed and water those animals in the car, then you must remove them from the car and feed and water them. If you elect to use the cars in which they can be fed and watered and done perfectly, then there is no occasion for their removal. If I can make the subject any plainer, I should like to know how.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think, after all, the shipper is to be the judge of how he wants his cattle to go. He is to be the gainer or the loser if they are shipped properly or improperly. Therefore the Senator's bill cannot be needed; and he admits himself that the present law does not have any effect. After all, it is a matter of competition between railroads and between individuals. The railroad that gives the best accommodation and carries for the least money will transport the stock. That is the rule in regard to transportation generally. If that be so, I do not know what we want with the present bill. It appears to me the existing law covers all the points except the one probably that we are now arguing, and that is as to the particular kind of car that is to be used; and when a certain car is used you may keep the cattle in it sixty hours. Twenty-eight hours it is contended by a great many is too long a time. Sixty hours is more than double as long, and why keep them sixty hours? As I just said, who is to be the judge? If the shipper wants to keep the cattle in sixty hours, he will choose that car; and so it comes down to the sixty-hour rule after all.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, let me try another plan and see if I can make the Senator understand me. I must confess that I am not very expert in explaining matters, and fear I have not made it plain. We will suppose a case. A man in Saint Louis desires to ship a hundred head of beeves from Saint Louis to New York. As I said, upon each of the side tracks are cars, one of them an improved method, which permits you to put your feed in and carry it along the line of the road and feed them as you wish, and water them as you wish. The feed costs you ten cents a bushel, for instance, to put in that car. That car contains the facilities for carrying the feed. The other car does not; and you are therefore forced to patronize the stock-yards, and you pay a dollar and a half a bushel for all the corn you purchase along the line of the road in reaching the market. I want to ask the Senator which car his judgment would select. Moreover, if he fed and watered them faithfully in transit, he would save one-half the shrinkage.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is plain enough, without a law or with a law. The owner would take that car which was of the most advantage to him. That is a plain question, and it makes no difference whether this bill passes or not as to which car is to be selected. As a test I move to strike out the proviso which provides that the cattle shall remain on the car sixty hours, for it is practically that after all; that is, from the word "provided," in line 52, down to the word "rest," in line 59, in the following words:

Provided, however, In all cases when animals in transit from one place to another be transported in cars, boats, and other vessels in which said animals do have daily proper food and water, the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply: Provided further, In no case shall animals be confined in cars for a longer period than sixty consecutive hours without unloading the same for rest.

That covers the whole question. If that remains as it is, sixty hours is the time allotted. That is plain to almost everybody, because the railroad or the shipper is to be the judge of the car and nobody else. If that is left out, then twenty-eight hours is the time.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let me explain exactly what the result of that would be. We would have multiplied these stock-yards; we would have increased them by the operation of the law; for we would provide that they must unload the stock every twenty-eight hours. It is now done perhaps every fifty, sixty, or one hundred hours, as the case may be. Thereby we will have increased the expense to the shipper and the producer of the stock. The Senator from West Virginia desires to have the proviso stricken out, which is the only provision of the bill by which the stock-yard corporations that the Senator from Kentucky avers are continually robbing the producer of live stock can be broken down. That is simply the result of the amendment. It would rob the bill of its competitive features. We cannot go along the lines of railroad and compel them to build competing stock-yards everywhere. Neither can we compel them to sell food at any particular price. Here is a provision by which competition is made possible, and the Senator from West Virginia says he wants to have it stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator made a speech of two hours yesterday, and an able speech, in which he told us that twenty-eight hours was the longest time the stock possibly could remain on the cars without injury. The Senator from Indiana this morning wanted twenty-four hours, but the Senator from New Jersey thought twenty-eight hours was just the time. Now, here is a sixty-hour provision, and the Senator from New Jersey advocates that.

I withdraw my motion to strike out. I think the best thing to do is to refer this bill back to the Committee on Commerce and let the committee pass upon it. Though it is unnecessary for me to say so, probably there has been no committee as a committee acting upon the bill at this session. I do not say that that is true, but such is my information. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, and with that motion I have done. I have said all I want to say.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I must insist that the Senator will not misrepresent me upon this matter. He says that I argued this morning that twenty-eight hours was the proper time. Now he says that I am willing they should be kept in confinement sixty hours. Will not the Senator observe the bill provides that if cattle are fed and watered along the line of the road they may be kept in confinement; but if they are not fed and watered, then they must be removed to be fed and watered? In other words, you can run live stock twenty-eight hours without feeding them, and then they may be taken off and fed and watered; but if from the time you start them, say every five or ten hours, they are given food and water, it seems to me it makes a great difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McPHERSON. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think as this is a test question on the bill, we had as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Allison,	Dawes,	Maxey,	Vest,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Paddock,	Voorhees
Booth,	Farley,	Saulsbury,	Wallace.
Coke,	Hereford,	Teller,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Vance,

NAYS—33.

Bayard,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Bell,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Gordon,	Logan,	Slater,
Burnside,	Harris,	McMillan,	Walker,
Butler,	Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Williams,
Call,	Houston,	Morgan,	Windom.
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jonas,	Platt,
Chandler,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,

ABSENT—25.

Anthony,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bailey,	Groome,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Grover,	Lamar,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Hamlin,	McDonald,	Withers.
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Conkling,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saunders,

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I voted for the motion to recommit the bill because this is a matter requiring a great deal of consideration. There is a provision in the bill that I think we ought to strike out. Section 4389 as proposed to be amended makes it the duty of the United States attorneys to prosecute all persons violating this proposed law and by a subsequent provision one-half of the penalties, fines, and forfeitures recovered is to inure to the benefit of the person complaining, the person who gives information.

Mr. McPHERSON. That has been stricken out, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. No, it has not been stricken out.

Mr. McPHERSON. I supposed it had been stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely gave notice that I should make a motion to strike it out.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am very willing that it shall be stricken out.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I proposed to make such a motion, but as the Senator from Iowa has given notice that he would move to strike out those words I yield to him.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 142 the words "one-half to the complainant and the other half" should be stricken out.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That will better the bill. While I am on my feet, I will say that I voted against these provisions in 1873 according to my remembrance; and I did so then because I had doubt, very grave doubt, whether this was such a regulation of commerce as Congress ought at that time to enter upon. While I admit fully the power of Congress to regulate commerce with a foreign power and between the States, I do not believe that such a proposition to regulate commerce as this ought to be adopted by Congress. Indeed I confess that I have some doubt as to whether it is competent for Congress to undertake to regulate commerce carried on by artificial lines of communication. That provision of the Constitution was inserted before we had any railroads or artificial lines of communication. Certainly at that time it was intended to be a power to be exercised in reference to the natural highways of commerce. But I believe it has come to be the settled opinion of Congress, because they sometimes have acted upon such a construction, that with reference to artificial lines of communication between the several States it is competent for Congress to exercise the power and to regulate commerce. Still if I were to admit fully all that is claimed in that regard by those who assert the fullest power of Congress over this subject, I should still feel some hesitation in giving my assent to the propositions contained in this bill, because I have very grave doubt as to whether it is such an exercise of the power given to Congress as we ought, without great deliberation and great care, to enter upon.

It was for this reason that I voted against the proposition in 1873, and it is because of this grave doubt in reference to whether we ought to enter upon this subject without the most careful consideration of every question connected with it that I shall be compelled to withhold my vote from this bill. I do not think we ought to take any step in reference to this matter without having considered it fully, deliberately, and carefully. While I am well aware that there is very great complaint in reference to the transportation of cattle, while there is great inhumanity, while there is doubtless injury that may result to the consumer of the animal after it is converted into beef, still I think we had better get along as we are doing at present rather than incorporate provisions that we may hereafter find to be disadvantageous.

Without going into the question fully, I desired to state these views as the reason for withholding my vote from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware propose an amendment to the bill?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; I understand the Senator from Iowa to propose to strike out in line 142 the words "one-half to the complainant, and the other half." That, then, is the question pending before the Senate. I was going to make the same motion, not being aware that the Senator from Iowa had given notice of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 142 it is proposed to strike out the words "one-half to the complainant, and the other half;" so as to read:

All fines, penalties, and forfeitures collected under the provisions of this and the preceding sections shall inure to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is a topic of general legislation in respect of which Congress was not called together. Differing from the yellow-fever bill, there is not the urgency that there was about that, and I think it falls into that class of general and important legislation that we ought not to enter upon at this time. I think it ought to go over until December. For that reason I make the motion to postpone the bill until the first Monday of December next. That will give time for consideration and will put some barrier apparently upon our continual tendency to spend the whole summer here upon topics of general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the bill be postponed until the first Monday in December.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call for the yeas and nays. I hope the bill will not go over. After the discussion which has taken place upon the bill, I think the Senate understand it now as well as they ever will.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The discussion has developed the fact that there is a sincere diversity of views about the bill on very important questions, both practical questions of administration and questions of the bearing of these laws upon constitutional rights and regulations. Therefore I think this is one of those bills that may properly, now that the discussion has opened the views on all sides, be one of the very measures that should go over. Certainly if we can go into legislation of this kind at this session, there is nothing that we ought to postpone; whereas I think we should try to get on with the special business we came for.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I only desire to say that I shall vote against postponing the bill, because I am as well prepared to vote against it now as I shall be in December. I regard it simply as a bill in the interest of railroads, and not in the interest of the men who raise stock, because it forces them to put their cattle into pens and to pay all the exorbitant rates the railway companies may see fit to extort from them. I am therefore prepared to vote against the bill now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am opposed to the bill, believing that the present law, if any law is necessary, is equally as good if not better than the pending measure. I cannot vote for the bill in any form, and I shall vote that it go over until December. I think it would be better to postpone it; we shall have more time to reflect and think about it and to see what the country wants.

Mr. ALLISON. And to get the views of other people.

Mr. McPHERSON. I withdraw my call for the yeas and nays, as it seems to be the settled desire that the bill should go over until the next session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the last division a quorum of the Senate did not vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Chair to count the Senate and see if there is not a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the number of Senators present. [A pause.] The Secretary reports forty-one Senators in their seats.

Mr. TELLER. That is a quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the Chair put the question again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again submit the question, which is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the bill be postponed until the first Monday in December next.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the post-route bill which has just come from the House be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. In that connection I ask Senators who have amendments to offer to the bill to have them prepared and sent to the Post-Office Committee by Thursday morning at the farthest, as that is the day of the next committee meeting, and we wish to report the bill back at the earliest possible time.

The bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 629) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 630) to authorize the National Academy of Sciences to become the trustee of funds to be applied in aid of scientific investigations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 631) donating six condemned cannon and cannonballs to Post No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Muncy, Pennsylvania, for monumental purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 632) for the relief of James M. Wilbur; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOSEPH B. COLLINS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. I desire the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw the motion for a moment, until I appeal to the Senate to act on a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs which will take but a moment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senate to agree to take up a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It is an amendment to a former act, and it is necessary the amendment should be agreed to prior to the confirmation of an officer of the Army whose name has been sent to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the proposition?

Mr. LOGAN. It is that the Senate act on a bill amending an act relating to an officer whose name is here for confirmation.

Mr. HARRIS. We do not hear at all here. We do not know anything about what the Senator from Illinois is saying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see how the Senate can adjourn while I am on the floor and have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator cannot properly be on the floor, the motion to go into executive session not being debatable and the yeas and nays having been ordered on that motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Rhode Island withdrew the motion, and I asked the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to be withdrawn.

Mr. LOGAN. He withdrew the motion that I might ascertain whether or not the Senate would be willing to take up the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion cannot be withdrawn after the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to have the sense of the Senate upon taking up the bill. It will take but a moment to act upon it. I will explain that there is a nomination before the Senate; an officer is to be appointed in the Army whose appointment has been authorized by an act of Congress. The act that authorized his appointment was of such a character as to allow him to be paid several years after he was out of the service. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported an amendment to the act so as to prohibit payment for the time he was out of the service, and that amendment must be acted upon by Congress prior to the confirmation. The Committee on Military Affairs authorized me to call up the bill, and I desire the action of the Senate upon it. It will take but a moment. As soon as the bill is read the Senate will see the necessity of passing it. I ask that it be taken up and passed, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 595) to amend an act for the relief of Joseph B. Collins, approved March 3, 1879. It amends the act so as to strike out all after the words "mustered out," and insert the following:

Provided. That he shall receive no pay or allowance whatever for the time he has been out of the military service of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. It is only an amendment to the act, so as to allow payment only for the time he actually served in the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 27.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOOTH, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] on political questions. I withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not think this is political.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BOOTH. I announced a pair with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] We agreed that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] should decide whether a question was political or not. Having referred the matter to him, I now ask that my name be called and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Allison,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Bell,	Edmunds,	Kirkwood,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Ferry,	Logan,	Teller,
Booth,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Windom.
Burnside,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Paddock,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Nevada,	Randolph,

NAYS—32.

Bayard,	Eaton,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Butler,	Garland,	McDonald,	Vance,
Call,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker,
Conkling,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Davis of W. Va.,	Houston,	Ransom,	Williams.

ABSENT—19.

Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Sharon,
Bailey,	Grover,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	Lamar,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Hampton,	Platt,	Withers.
Chandler,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,

So the motion was not agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF SUBSIDIARY COINS.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4 to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 27, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. STEELE. I observe that on page 40 of the RECORD of May 24 I am recorded as having voted in the affirmative upon the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that the House adjourn. That is an error. Whether it be a merit or a demerit to vote on the side of that gentleman, I am not often guilty of it. I did not vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HILL. I observe that I am not announced in the RECORD as being paired on the vote on Saturday on the passage of the bill reported by my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] providing for the unlimited coinage of silver. I desire to state that I was paired on that question with my colleague, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH,] and that, had I been present, I should have voted for the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ERRETT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. SPRINGER. Pending the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I ask unanimous consent that the States be called at this time for the introduction of bills for reference. I think that would be the fairest course to all gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that one hour be allowed this morning for the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills for reference only. Is there objection?

Mr. BREWER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask unanimous consent that this call as of Monday may be had to-morrow. That will accommodate gentlemen who have not their bills with them to-day.

Mr. CONGER. The only bills that are desirable are the appropriation bills, and they can be reported at any time.

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. My request is merely for the convenience of members that they may have their bills introduced for reference and printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERRETT] for unanimous consent to introduce a bill at this time for reference?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object, unless we can all have the same privilege.

Several members called for the regular order.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts. The pending question is on seconding the demand for the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is, is it competent for the House to refer the bill now pending to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? I do not desire to antagonize the bill, as a matter of course.

The SPEAKER. That motion will not be in order pending a demand for the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois. I am perfectly willing to allow debate upon this bill or amendments to be offered. It is not the purpose of the committee which I represent to cut off debate or amendment. We are of the opinion that this is as important a bill as has been introduced during this Congress. I am acting under the instruction of the committee, and must insist upon the previous question. I am perfectly willing that the bill shall be taken out of the morning hour and set for consideration on some other day, and if we can agree to that to allow a reasonable time for debate, and that the bill shall then be open for amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I think that proposition will be acquiesced in.

Mr. CONGER. I think not; I am very positive that it will not be acquiesced in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] desires to allow any reasonable length of debate that may be demanded, and that the bill may be open to amendment and taken out of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. Is debate to be before the amendment or after?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman knows that if the bill be taken up after the morning hour it will be open to debate or amendment.

Mr. CONGER. It seems to me much better to keep the bill in the morning hour; we can then debate it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now there are two ways to defeat the bill: one is to refer the bill to some committee where it perhaps will never be heard from again, and the other is by a direct vote of the House upon it. Acting as the organ of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, I must demand the previous question on the bill.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit me to make a remark in connection with this bill——

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to fill up the morning hour I will renew the demand for the previous question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am willing to accede to the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It seems to me that this is trifling with the House and that it is wrong to allow but one question during the morning hour. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will see that the only proper course is to refer this bill to another committee, or to dispose of it now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am asking to have it disposed of now.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] demands the previous question.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. FRYE. I object to any debate unless the demand for the previous question is withdrawn, and if it is withdrawn I desire to be heard myself.

Mr. ACKLEN. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the demand for the previous question, and let a motion be made, either that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or, if the majority desire it, the bill be not referred to the Judiciary Committee. A vote to be taken will test the sense of the House upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That would be rather a peculiar way of testing the sense of the House upon the bill. It has been intimated that many gentlemen who approve the bill might be governed by selfish motives, and in order to obtain action on their local or private interests vote to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, or some other committee. I object to delay or defeat by reference, and insist on the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] states distinctly that if the motion for the previous question is withdrawn he demands the right to be heard on the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not withdraw the demand for the previous question; this is simply an effort to defeat the bill by indirect action.

The question was put on seconding the demand for the previous question, and on a division there were—ayes 73, noes 4.

No quorum voting, the Speaker appointed Mr. CONGER, and Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 2.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich, N. W.	Dick,	Loring,	Russell, Daniel L.
Bailey,	Dickey,	Lounsbery,	Shelley,
Ballou,	Einstein,	Lowe,	Singleton, J. W.

Cowgill,	Kitchin,	Reed,	Young, Thomas L.
Crowley,	Klotz,	Robeson,
Culberson,	Lay,	Ross,

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fourteen members have answered to their names.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. Excuses are not now in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes none.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER said: No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER, and Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 18, noes none.

Mr. CONGER, (one of the tellers.) No quorum has voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I believe it does not require a quorum to dispense with all further proceedings under a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 191, nays 5, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—191.

So the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. MONEY. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. MILES.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, is paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. VOORHIS.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I am paired with the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. SAPP. My colleague, Mr. PRICE, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BUCKNER.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I now renew the demand for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. WEAVER. I wish to offer an amendment to be considered as pending.

Mr. CONGER. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am willing that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa shall be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

Mr. WEAVER. Has the gentleman any objection to having my amendment considered as pending?

Mr. CONGER. Very serious objection.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

The House again divided on the question of seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were ayes 39, noes 1—no quorum voting.

CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The first business for consideration after the morning hour is the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1604) to increase the efficiency of the National Board of Health and to prevent the introduction into or spread within the United States of contagious and infectious diseases. The bill will be read.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Before the Clerk proceeds to read, I wish to say that the Committee on Epidemic Diseases have had this matter under advisement since the action of the House making this bill a special order, and have unanimously concluded that it would be best to call up the Senate bill and put it upon its passage instead of the House bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted as a special order for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill No. 108, to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration in lieu of the House bill which has been assigned as a special order. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose that the Senate bill will be allowed to be read and amended as if it were a House bill?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Of course it will be read, and any amendment will be submitted to the House, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill is subject to a point of order, I suppose. I do not, however, wish to make such point. I only desire that the measure may be open for discussion and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee states that it will be open for discussion and amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. As in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the Senate bill will be subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order can be reserved of course.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. As this bill makes an appropriation it would perhaps be well enough to move at once to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read, and if there be no objection the point of order probably will not be made.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I understood that the point of order was made.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any merchant ship or vessel from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act and all rules and regulations of State boards of health and all rules and regulations made in pursuance of this act; and any such vessel which shall enter or attempt to enter a port of the United States in violation thereof shall forfeit to the United States a sum, to be awarded in the discretion of the court, not exceeding $1,000, which shall be a lien upon said vessel, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States. And in all such proceedings the United States district attorney for such district shall appear on behalf of the United States, and all such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the rules and laws governing cases of seizure of vessels for violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. All such vessels shall be required to obtain from the consul, vice-consul, or other consular officer of the United States at the port of departure, or from the medical officer, where such officer has been detailed by the President for that purpose, a certificate in duplicate setting forth the sanitary history of said vessel, and that it has in all respects complied with the rules and regulations in such cases prescribed for securing the best sanitary condition of the said vessel, its cargo, passengers, and crew; and said consular or medical officer is required, before granting such certificate, to be satisfied the matters and things therein stated are true; and for his services in that behalf he shall be entitled to demand and receive such fees as shall by lawful regulation be allowed, to be accounted for as is required in other cases.

That upon the request of the National Board of Health the President is authorized to detail a medical officer to serve in the office of the consul at any foreign port for the purpose of making the inspection and giving the certificates hereinbefore mentioned: Provided, That the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed at any one time six: Provided further, That any vessel sailing from any such port without such certificate of said medical officer, entering any port of the United States, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500, which shall be a lien on the same, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States. And in all such proceedings the United States district attorney for such district shall appear on behalf of the United States, and all such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the rules and laws governing cases of seizure of vessels for violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the National Board of Health shall co-operate with and, so far as it lawfully may, aid State and municipal boards of health in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations of such boards to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, and into one State from another.

And at such ports and places within the United States as have no quarantine regulations under State authority, where such regulations are, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, necessary to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, and at such ports and places within the United States where quarantine regulations exist under the authority of the State which, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, are not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States, or into one State from another, the National Board of Health shall report the facts to the President of the United States, who shall, if, in his judgment, it is necessary and proper, order said Board of Health to make such additional rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, which, when so made and approved by the President, shall be promulgated by the National Board of Health and enforced by the sanitary authorities of the States, where the State authorities will undertake to execute and enforce them; but if the State authorities shall fail or refuse to enforce said rules and regulations, the President may detail an officer or appoint a proper person for that purpose.

The Board of Health shall make such rules and regulations as are authorized by the laws of the United States and necessary to be observed by vessels at the port of departure and on the voyage where such vessels sail from any foreign port or place at which contagious or infectious disease exists, to any port or place in the United States, to secure the best sanitary condition of such vessel, her cargo, passengers, and crew, and when said rules and regulations have been approved by the President they shall be published and communicated to, and enforced by, the consular officers of the United States: Provided, That none of the penalties herein imposed shall attach to any vessel or any owner or officer thereof, till the act and the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof shall have been officially promulgated for at least ten days in the port from which said vessel sailed.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the National Board of Health to obtain information of the sanitary condition of foreign ports and places from which contagious and infectious diseases are or may be imported into the United States, and to this end the consular officers of the United States at such ports and places as shall be designated by the National Board of Health shall make to said Board of Health weekly reports of the sanitary condition of the ports and places at which they are respectively stationed, according to such forms as said Board of Health may prescribe; and the Board of Health shall also obtain, through all sources accessible, including State and municipal sanitary authorities throughout the United States, weekly reports of the sanitary condition of ports and places within the United States; and shall prepare, publish, and transmit to the medical officers of the Marine Hospital Service, to collectors of customs, and to State and municipal health officers and authorities, weekly abstracts of the consular sanitary reports and other pertinent information received by said board; and shall also, as far as it may be able, by means of the voluntary co-operation of State and municipal authorities, of public associations and private persons, procure information relating to the climatic and other conditions affecting the public health; and shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury an annual report of its operations for transmission to Congress, with such recommendations as it may deem important to the public interests; and said report, if ordered to be printed by Congress, shall be done under the direction of the board.

SEC. 5. That the National Board of Health shall from time to time issue to the consular officers of the United States and to the medical officers serving at any foreign port, and otherwise make publicly known, the rules and regulations made by it and approved by the President, to be used and complied with by vessels in foreign ports for securing the best sanitary condition of such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, and crews, before their departure for any port in the United States, and in the course of the voyage; and all such other rules and regulations as shall be observed in the inspection of the same on the arrival thereof at any quarantine station at the port of destination, and for the disinfection and isolation of the same, and the treatment of cargo and persons on board, so as to prevent the introduction of cholera, yellow fever, or other contagious or infectious diseases; and it shall not be lawful for any vessel to enter said port to discharge its cargo or land its passengers except upon a certificate of the health officer at such quarantine station, certifying that said rules and regulations have in all respects been observed and complied with, as well on his part as on the part of the said vessel and its master, in respect to the same and to its cargo, passengers, and crew; and the master of every such vessel shall produce and deliver to the collector of customs at said port of entry, together with the other papers of the vessel, the said certificates required to be obtained at the port of departure, and the certificate herein required to be obtained from the health officer at the port of entry.

SEC. 6. That to pay the necessary expenses of placing vessels in proper sanitary condition, to be incurred under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to make the necessary rules and regulations fixing the amount of fees to be paid by vessels for such service, and the manner of collecting the same.

SEC. 7. That the President is authorized, when requested by the National Board of Health, and when the same can be done without prejudice to the public service, to detail officers from the several departments of the Government, for temporary duty, to act under the direction of said board, to carry out the provisions of this act; and such officers shall receive no additional compensation except for actual and necessary expenses incurred in the performance of such duties.

SEC. 8. That to meet the expenses to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury on estimates to be made by the National Board of Health, and to be approved by him. Said National Board of Health shall as often as quarterly make a full statement of its operations and expenditures under this act to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall report the same to Congress.

SEC. 9. That so much of the act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved April 29, 1878, as requires consular officers or other representatives of the United States at foreign ports to report the sanitary condition of and the departure of vessels from such ports to the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service; and so much of said act as requires the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service to frame rules and regulations, and to execute said act, and to give notice to Federal and State officers of the approach of infected vessels, and furnish said officers with weekly abstracts of consular sanitary reports, and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 10. This act shall not continue in force for a longer period than four years from the date of its approval.

Mr. CONGER. Let this bill be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] suggests that the bill be considered in Committee of the Whole by sections.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. I move, then, that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the subject embraced in this bill has been carefully and patiently considered in committees of the House and the Senate, whose investigations have extended over a period of two or three months. During this time most of the facts, I presume, which are important to be considered in arriving at a correct conclusion have been brought to the attention of one or both of these committees and have been thoroughly examined. But this class of legislation being a new experiment in the history of Congress, it is not surprising that there should have been found a wide diversity of opinion among gentlemen serving on these committees. There were those who had grave doubts as to the propriety of some provisions of the bill which met the entire approval of others. At the last regular session of Congress we were unable to agree in the House upon a measure such as was deemed necessary and effectual to accomplish the object designed—mainly in consequence of the differences of opinion to which I have alluded. Those differences to some extent still exist. The committee are not entirely unanimous in respect to all the provisions of either the Senate or the House bill, but they have agreed, in view of the importance of some measure being adopted at an early day, and in view of the fact that at the approaching regular session we can easily correct any mistakes we may by chance make now, it is better to submit the Senate bill and ask the House to pass it, with the frank statement on our part that it is a measure of compromise, not commanding the entire approval of every member of the committee in all its features. We believe, however, that under the circumstances it is the best thing which can be done; that we had better pass this measure and wait until the regular session to make such changes and alterations as experience may show to be necessary.

The committee has no desire to discuss the bill, and they would be glad to put it on its passage without discussion or amendment, but recognizing the fact that other gentlemen may differ with them and may wish to discuss some of its features, they will, of course, if such be the desire on the part of the House, allow the discussion to proceed. If, however, gentleman do not desire to discuss it, then if no member of the committee will do so I shall call the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to propose two amendments to the third and fourth sections.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would like to know whether any amendments were made to the bill before it finally passed the Senate?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. There were some trifling, immaterial ones, which do not change at all the structure of the bill as introduced.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Was any important feature of the bill in the Senate amended?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I have the bill before me as it was amended—the gentleman can examine it—and I do not see that any important feature is changed. The appropriation was reduced from $650,000 to $500,000; and there were two sections added to the bill, one, the ninth section, merely repealing all former acts in conflict with this legislation, and the tenth section, which limits its operation to four years. Those were the only alterations or amendments made to the printed bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Is this the same bill passed by the Senate at the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. No; it differs from that bill very materially.

Mr. FINLEY. Wherein does it differ?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. In several particulars. I could not name them now without having both bills before me.

Mr. FINLEY. How does it correspond with what was known as the "House bill" of the Forty-fifth Congress?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. It is, I think, a much better bill in every respect.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the gentleman calls the previous question I ask him to allow me to offer two amendments.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If the bill is to be open to discussion and amendment, I am under obligation to some members of the committee to yield first to them.

Mr. REAGAN. But the gentleman said that he was going to call the previous question on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Amendments will be in order as the sections are proceeded with. The gentleman from Texas, as the Chair understands, wishes to offer amendments to the third and fourth sections.

Mr. REAGAN. I do.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If there is to be discussion and amendments I must carry out the agreement made in committee that I should first yield to its members.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be open to amendment under the five-minute rule when the House has concluded general debate.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I will reserve what further remarks I have to make upon the bill until other gentlemen have spoken, and now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. MCGOWAN.]

[Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, withholds his further remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. MCGOWAN. Mr. Speaker, for the first time in the history of the country it is proposed to establish a national quarantine, both external and internal. The power to do this is sought under that provision of the Constitution granting to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

I am well aware that the question is not free from difficulties; but in the growth and development of the country such questions are constantly arising. A constitution made for a newly born nation could hardly anticipate and provide for all the emergencies and contingencies that might possibly arise. New constructions and new amendments are from time to time needed. Otherwise what was intended as a protection and a defense comes, like an inflexible garment on a growing child, to dwarf and deform and eventually destroy.

There is no better illustration of this than the subject-matter which we are about to discuss. The Constitution makes no direct provision for national sanitary and health laws. Yet year after year there come to us plagues and contagions which destroy the people and which the States can neither prohibit nor control, and which the General Government might both prohibit and control. Naturally, rightfully, the people ask either that the power be found in some of the clauses of the Constitution or that the Constitution be amended. Under the pressure of this demand your committee have sought the power assumed in this bill and believe we have found it in the simple words of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution.

> The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

The subject embraced in this short clause was the one above all others which brought together the convention which framed the Constitution. Under the confederation the States were at liberty to enact their own laws relating to commerce. Of course they were not uniform. This led to such confusion and placed such burdens upon trade, and was the prolific source of such jealousies and sectional feeling as to actually endanger the Union. After a protracted and somewhat heated discussion the convention adopted the clause as it now stands. Gentlemen are too familiar with that part of our political history which led to the convention of 1787 and the adoption of our Constitution for me to repeat any portion of it. But no one can read that history or the debates in convention without being impressed with the pre-eminent importance then attached to the subject of foreign and domestic commerce; neither can they come to any other conclusion than that the convention intended to give to Congress complete and exclusive jurisdiction over the same. The fathers had seen the danger and were too wise not to close the door, as they supposed, against it.

But in construing this portion of the Constitution we are not left alone to the history of its adoption. The Supreme Court has had occasion to pass upon it under a variety of circumstances, and from these various decisions we are warranted in drawing the following conclusions: first, that the power of Congress over both foreign and interstate commerce is complete and absolute; second, that this power extends even to the embargo of ships and the stoppage of internal trade; and, third, it appertains to individuals engaged in carrying on such commerce and to persons being transported, as well as to cargoes and freights.

In the noted case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 196, the court remarks upon the history and construction of this clause as follows:

> As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed the Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said. If from the imperfection of human language there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, it is a well-settled rule that the objects for which it was given, especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself, should have great influence in the construction.

The power over commerce, including navigation, was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their Government. And then the court adds that commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary-line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior.

The power to "regulate" is the power "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed:"

> This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. * * * Congress may control the State laws so far as it may be necessary to control them for the regulation of commerce. * * * A law of a State made in pursuance of its acknowledged powers must give way when in conflict with a law of Congress made within the powers of the Constitution. * * * The power to regulate commerce extends as well to vessels employed in carrying passengers as to those employed in transporting property.

In Corfield vs. Coryell, 4 N. C. C., 378, a case decided as early as 1803, Judge Bushrod Washington holds the following language regarding this section of the Constitution:

> Commerce with foreign nations and among the several States can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations and among those States for purposes of trade, be the object of the trade what it may; and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States or by a passage overland through the States where such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the States.

It is this intercourse which Congress is invested with the power of regulating, and with which no State has the right to interfere.

In United States vs. Lawrence Coombs, 12 Peters, 72, it is observed, "under the clause of the Constitution giving the power to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations," &c., the power to regulate does not stop at the mere boundary line of a State. It extends to such acts done on land which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate commerce and navigation with foreign nations and among the States. Any offense which thus interferes with, obstructs, or prevents such commerce and navigation, though done on land, may be punished by Congress, under its general authority to make all laws necessary and proper to execute their delegated constitutional powers.

In The City of New York vs. Miln, 11 Peters, 102, and in some other cases there is dicta to the effect that where certain powers are by the Constitution conferred on Congress yet so long as Congress neglects to legislate to enforce these powers the States may properly and legitimately do so, but subject to the limitation that when Congress does act and there is a collision between the State and general law the State law must give way. This was apparent in the famous case of Ogden vs. Saunders, 12 Wheaton, 213, which involved the question of State and national bankrupt laws. But I am unable to find in any of the cases even a dicta to the purport that where Congress assumes to act and legislates, subject to a constitutionally granted power, such legislation is not complete and supreme.

In Cooley vs. Board of Wardens of the port of Philadelphia, 12 How., 299, the court hold that it is not merely the existence of a constitutional power in Congress, but its exercise, which is incompatible with the exercise of the same power by the States; and that the States may legislate in the absence of congressional legislation. Also that where Congress has legislated and not covered the whole subject, the States may legislate to the extent that they do not interfere with United States law in existence. Two of the judges dissented from this opinion, and held that under the section of the Constitution granting the power to Congress to regulate commerce, &c., Congress held the power exclusively, whether it saw fit to exercise it or not.

In the late case of The Railroad Company vs. Husen, 5 Otto, 465, Justice Strong holds the complete jurisdiction of the General Government over the question of interstate and external commerce in the following language:

> Whatever may be the power of a State over commerce that is completely internal, it can no more prohibit or regulate that which is interstate than it can that which is with foreign nations. Power over one is given by the Constitution of the United States to Congress in the same words in which it is given over the other, and in both cases it is necessarily exclusive. That the transportation of property from one State to another is a branch of interstate commerce is undeniable. * * * Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself; and every obstacle to it or burden laid upon it by legislative authority is regulation.

In Henderson et al. vs. Mayor of the City of New York, (92 U. S., 259,) as quoted in Railroad Company vs. Husen, the court declares it to be clear from the nature of our complex form of government that whenever the statute of a State invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall or how closely allied it may be to powers conceded to belong to the States. The police powers reserved to the States sometimes come very near to the field committed by the Constitution to Congress, and it is the duty of the courts to guard vigilantly against any needless intrusion.

As still more clearly expressing the doctrine of the final supremacy of all national law enacted in conformity to powers granted by the Constitution the court, in Henderson et al. vs. The Mayor of New York, (2 Otto, 272,) says:

> Whenever the statute of a State invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied to powers conceded to belong to the States.

Again in 9 Wheat., 210, the laws of the State, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to the act of Congress made in pursuance of constitutional provision.

From these decisions, which I have not attempted to give in their logical or even chronological order, it will be readily apparent that, for all purposes of foreign and interstate commerce Congress alone has the full and complete power of legislation.

We have now reached the question of how far such legislation may be made to yield and be molded by considerations of public health. Certainly so far as sanitary and health questions come to effect commerce, to that extent they may be considered. Fundamentally all commerce and trade, all prosperity, civilization itself, depend upon the health of the people. But if this relation should be considered too remote for the purposes of this debate, it cannot be denied that such a plague as swept over a number of the Southern States last summer has a direct and immediate influence upon commerce. It paralyzes and destroys it. It dries up the very fountains of trade. And to say that the power of Congress over commerce could not be exercised to save commerce itself, would seem to be absurd.

It is true that the States have jurisdiction over matters of health. They may pass sanitary and quarantine laws. But these have no force outside of State lines. At best they are only a partial protection. Each State must depend not alone upon the good faith but the good sense and efficiency of her neighbors. State laws, when intelligently drawn and faithfully executed, are probably sufficient protection in ordinary times and from ordinary disorders. But when a dangerous contagious disease prevails, and is likely to be carried along the lines of interstate travel and commerce—up the mighty rivers, across the great lakes, and along the immense lines of railroads—then State enactments do not avail, and the General Government must come to the rescue or the people be left to the cruel mercy of the destroyer.

The committee, believing with Justice Story that "Congress may make that a regulation of commerce which a State may employ as a guard for its internal policy, or to preserve the public health or peace, or to promote its own peculiar interests," have reported this bill.

It is not a yellow-fever bill. It is not intended for the special protection of any one section of the country. Yellow fever came to us last summer and was confined to the South. The committee reporting the bill undoubtedly owes its existence to that fact. Should the measure become a law it is likely that the machinery which it sets up may first be called into play to stay the spread of that disease. Yet this does not necessarily follow. Certain climatic changes may have already taken place which will effectually save the country from a repetition of last year's disaster. The next enemy of health to be met and thrust back by national quarantine may be Asiatic cholera. It now prevails abroad.

This is a general measure intended to protect the country, so far as Congress may do so, from the introduction and spread of those dangerous, contagious diseases that so frequently come to desolate our homes and destroy our prosperity. The charge is made against it that it is an experiment. That is true. All new laws are experiments, and are usually only perfected after they have been tried. We can scarcely hope that this one is perfect. But if Congress has the power to act at all in this matter, as we sincerely believe it has, then the time is ripe for action now. Danger threatens us on all sides. Less than one-half of the States have any laws concerning the subject of health, and not more than half a dozen of these have legislated efficiently or appropriated any money for enforcing such laws as they have. That season of the year which nourishes and encourages contagion is at hand. Two formidable and dangerous contagions are threatening us. To prevent is wisdom. To lie still until the trouble is upon us and the means and the charity of the people are taxed for succor, is not only folly, but something worse.

The last weekly report of the Surgeon-General of the United States Marine Hospital Service, being for the week ending May 17, shows that yellow fever prevails in Cuba and Hayti. There have also been some cases in Brazil. At Havana there were eight deaths from the fever during the week and twenty from small-pox. At Port au Prince the fever prevailed for the first time in fifteen years, and was increasing in violence. Within a very few days impending danger will lurk in every craft coming to us from the West Indies. It is also reported that at Port au Prince a new contagion, said to be distinct from yellow fever, and known as La Mauvaise fever, is prevalent. Many people have died from it, and it is even more feared than yellow fever. In regard to the sanitary condition of the city, Minister Langston reports that "the streets are constantly foul, and that not even police regulations of any sort are enforced. There is no regulation to oblige even the filthiest persons to remove deposits from the streets nor from the gutters or sidewalks in front of their doors, and the harbor is also full of foul matter of every sort."

Here, almost within sight of our own shores, the enemy is preparing to attack us; massing his forces and storing endless quantities of ammunition. Shall we wait until his preparations are complete and then furnish him a fleet for the transportation of his troops, or shall we take measures for our own safety?

But our immediate danger is not confined to the South nor to yellow fever. The cholera in Asia and European Russia is epidemic. It is true that late reports from the affected regions are more favorable. But such reports, coming through such sources, should not be implicitly relied upon. It is a disease that goes rapidly along the lines of travel, and has never prevailed any great length of time in an epidemic form in Europe without reaching the United States.

Dr. Peters, in his History of the Asiatic Cholera, claims that ever since 1756 (one hundred and twenty-three years ago) it has recurred as an epidemic in periods of twelve years each, corresponding with the twelve yearly festivals of the Hindoos. The disease is native to India, and constantly exists there in some form. During these festivals, which are pilgrimages to the various shrines, thousands, and even millions, leave their homes and journey and mingle together. In this way the disease is spread and becomes epidemic. It follows the great routes of travel to the west and northwest until it passes through Asia into Europe and eventually to America. In 1826 it became epidemic in Hindostan, its native home, and gradually spread until, in 1829, it was distributed throughout Russia, reaching England in 1830-'31.

In the spring of 1832 it was brought to Quebec, from whence it was carried up the Saint Lawrence and across the lakes to Detroit, where it met the United States troops going to the Black Hawk war. It was distributed to all the national posts and forts in the then extreme West, being specially severe at Fort Dearborn, Chicago, Fort Crawford, near Prairie Du Chien, and Fort Armstrong, at Rock Island. From the latter place it was carried down the Mississippi River, striking New Orleans in October of the same year.

Twelve years thereafter, or in 1841, this contagion started in another tour around the world. It was found at Hurdwar in 1843; at Afghanistan, in Persia, in 1845; at Teheran in 1846, and Astrakhan in 1847. In 1848 it reached Havre, and was carried to New Orleans in some German emigrant ships the same year. From New Orleans it followed the travel up the Mississippi and along the Ohio. From Saint Louis it was carried over the emigrant route to San Francisco, and eventually was distributed over nearly the whole country. Thus it will be seen that within the space of fourteen years the country suffered two visitations from the terrible plague. The first time, being introduced at Quebec and following the rivers and lakes, it reaches New Orleans by going down the Mississippi; the second time, it starts at New Orleans and goes up the river, and is thus distributed. Each time it follows the great national highways, and each time it is largely distributed by the United States Army, which it at the same time decimates.

The last great twelve-yearly cholera epidemic commenced in India in April, 1865. By means of railroads and steamboats it traveled more rapidly than it had in previous years, reaching Mecca, on the Red Sea, by May 2, Alexandria by June 2, and England by the 10th of July. Emigrant ships soon brought it to New York City, where it readily passed the local quarantine, made a center of distribution of the great city, and from thence spread along the railroads and highways of travel all over the country. This author, Dr. Peters, who I believe is a resident of New York and a member of her board of health, writing previous to 1874, says:

In 1877 and 1879 we may expect an outbreak of the disease such as there was in 1781–'83, 1817–'19, 1829–'31, 1841–'43, 1853–'55, and 1865–'67.

And he adds:

In our next contest with the disease our whole safety lies in quarantine and thorough disinfection.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that I have thus shown the power of Congress over this subject and the necessity for prompt action. I shall not attempt a particular statement of the provisions of this bill. I shall leave that entirely to other gentlemen of the committee.

I only desire now for a moment to briefly allude to some objections, made in a general way, to the measure. It is said that if the power of the General Government to act in the premises is granted, yet it is a matter that should be left wholly to the States. This assertion is worth nothing in face of the fact that most of the States fail to take care of themselves and actually endanger their neighbors. The power which the States have in the matter is to be used wholly at their discretion. If New Orleans allows yellow fever to come into her port and pass up the river, then Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, and other States are endangered by the negligence or failure of Louisiana and are without remedy. If Detroit fails to keep out the cholera which comes over the lake from Canada, the whole country, including the Army, suffers. If New York receives emigrant ships with cholera aboard and makes of the city a great plague spot, what remedy has New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts?

My friend, the honorable and learned chairman of the committee reporting this bill, is a citizen of the State of Tennessee, and is entitled to all the protection and safeguards which his State may throw around her citizens, but he is at the same time a citizen of the United States, and when the more limited authority for any reason fails to protect his property and his life he has a right to appeal to all the legal power vested in the United States to aid him.

Memphis has a right to ask us to protect her against New Orleans. In the lives of the people is found the life of the nation. State quarantine and State health laws can never be effective in preventing and staying contagions. Two admitted facts make it impossible: they have no jurisdiction outside their own territorial limits, and no control over interstate commerce. These limitations on their powers are alone sufficient to warrant the General Government in enacting a national quarantine law.

But there are other and inherent difficulties in the enforcement of local laws. Sad as it may be, it is still the truth, that with very many people cupidity is stronger than the love of humanity. Traders and merchants will frequently run great risks of life rather than endanger their profits. Local laws and local officers are likely to yield to local pressure. So far as I can ascertain I am convinced that local quarantine as a rule is a failure. New York City and a few other northern ports are the exception. They serve to emphasize the rule, and are exceptions to it more from the fact that most excellent officers have been secured than from any intrinsic worth in the system.

A national quarantine, under a well-digested law, manned by national officers, backed by the national resources and power, and responsible alone to national authority, is the only efficient and safe one for the whole country. It is useless in this vast country to point us to a few localities that have good health laws and efficient health officers. When we consider our thousands of miles of sea-coast on either side of the continent, our almost endless stretch of navigable rivers and great inland lakes, and further consider the eighty thousand miles of railroad binding State to State and State to Territory in one linked brotherhood from ocean to ocean, and then remember that but seventeen of all the States have any health laws whatever, that but four or five sea-ports are properly quarantined, and further remember how death and destruction last summer walked in at our open doors and is likely to do so again, can any member hesitate to give to the country at this late hour a uniform national system of sanitary laws?

Mr. MANNING. Mr. Speaker, although I am not a member of the committee which asks for the concurrence of this House in the Senate bill in regard to contagious and epidemic diseases, yet feeling the profoundest interest in this measure I venture to submit my own views touching our duty at this hour, and sincerely hope that there will be no opposition developed to the proposed action which has already been postponed too long.

Urgent necessity for effective quarantine legislation should be conceded by reflecting persons of all shades of political opinion. The experience of our people in the valley of the Mississippi last summer and autumn warns us of the importance of prompt and vigorous legislation to protect us against another such epidemic as we were then visited with.

Let our warning be valued by remembering that over twenty thousand men, women, and children were swept into eternity as if by a besom of destruction, and that over one hundred thousand others were stricken by the dreadful disease called yellow fever, involving an expenditure of millions of money and incalculable damage to property and the industries of the country. We are admonished by the physicians of the whole land without an exception, and also by the joint committees of Congress charged with the investigation of the subject of the supreme importance of passing efficient laws without delay.

I was startled by the confession made by one of our most distinguished doctors of medicine in a speech delivered by him last fall before a convention of his brethren in Richmond, Virginia. I refer to Dr. Elisha Harris, of New York, the president of the American Board of Health.

In the very outset of his speech on that occasion he said, in substance, with the frankness of a great and good man, "Gentlemen of the convention, we must admit the fact broadly and unqualifiedly before the people of this country and the whole world that the doctors of medicine have made no material headway in their efforts to ascertain a sovereign remedy for yellow fever in the last two hundred years. After the yellow fever plague which visited Lisbon many generations ago, a chronicler of that period in writing its history said, 'a dreadful disease held sway, and art stood helpless by.' A similar confession must be made by the chronicler of the plague which visited the valley of the Mississippi last summer."

As science can offer no resistance to the ravages of this disease, and as it is not indigenous here—seventy-seven of the eighty-eight epidemics being directly traceable to importations—it is all-important to put forth our best efforts to prevent its introduction and spread in this country. If we fail we may expect it to come again to destroy thousands upon thousands of our people, crush the hearts of those who survive, and paralyze more or less the prosperity of all.

Dr. Vanderpoel, of New York, perhaps second to none in distinction, and who has probably more familiarity with State quarantine laws than any other man of his profession, being now and for many years past at the head of the quarantine system of his State, and who at the outset of this discussion in the last Congress was understood to be opposed to congressional legislation, and encouraged the efforts of certain gentlemen in both Houses of Congress—and I regret to know that some democrats have been thus far prominent in the opposition encountered—to show that Congress should do but little if anything on the subject, leaving it mainly if not altogether to the States, said in a recent speech at a meeting of the Mississippi Valley Sanitary Association at Atlanta, Georgia, that he recognized the necessity of legislation by this body.

He believed that State regulations should not be wholly relied upon; that over twenty States having no laws whatever upon the subject Congress could and should do much to aid those States which have already legislated in making efficient their own quarantine laws, and should look after those States which have given the subject no attention. He knew and appreciated what was admitted a few days ago by Senator CALL, of Florida, that that State, with its coast of over fifteen hundred miles, limited revenue, and sparse population, and proximity to Cuba, from which yellow fever is generally imported into our borders, could not prevent the introduction and spread of that terrible destroyer; that so far as Florida is concerned the Federal Government must post its sentinels and keep constant watch upon the enemy.

Dr. Vanderpoel is of course much wedded to the present quarantine system of New York, of which he is the accredited head, and which has been perfected by the experience of that great metropolis for a hundred years; yet he recognizes the wisdom of the pending bill, and is willing that the power of the Government asserted therein shall be exercised even as to his own admirable system.

I invoke the influence of the judgment of this distinguished doctor especially upon the members from the State of New York, and I heartily commend him, situated as he is, for going to the extent stated, although I think the Constitution of the United States and the facts of the case justify us in going much further.

This bill in effect declares to State authorities, "We will stand and watch upon the outer lines of your ports; we will require ships, cargoes, and passengers alike, before entering your jurisdiction, to be examined by our officers. Our agents will be also within your borders to hold up the hands of your officers, and if any part of the line is unguarded, such exposed locality will be under the vigilance and control of Federal officers." This bill, then, is a mere auxiliary to State authority, which I sincerely hope will meet with unanimous support. For myself I do not hesitate to declare that I would more cordially favor a bill which recognized greater power in the Government than is now asserted, and if it were practicable I would propose now to legislate broadly and fully.

I deeply regretted the failure to pass the Senate bill last session, and I was not surprised at the general criticism which followed that failure. I voted for the bill then reported by the House committee as a substitute for the Senate bill, not because I preferred the former, but because it was apparent to me on that occasion, as it was to others who favored the latter, that the only possible way to secure its passage or something near it was to adopt the House bill, which would bring about a conference between the two Houses, when in the spirit of compromise the friends of the House bill would yield something to the views of the Senate conferees and thus accomplish indirectly that which could not then be accomplished directly. Any other course in the closing hours of the session I knew would inevitably destroy every chance to pass the Senate bill, the House committee being unanimous in reporting its own measure, but it is only fair here to state that Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, himself preferred the Senate bill, and only reported the House bill in deference to the wishes of the committee of which he was chairman. This digression I have thought proper to make because the record of the matter without explanation is calculated to mislead.

Before entering upon the argument which I will presently submit, let me again pause, and attempt in a slight degree to express the deep and boundless gratitude of a solid South—at least in this respect—to the northern people who with a magnanimity never before excelled in any country so promptly, without awaiting the piteous cry for help, opened their bounteous purses and prodigally lavished their generous favors upon us. By the interposition of Divine Providence the pestilence was stayed and the scenes of earthly desolation are made to bloom again with the sweet flowers of hope and prosperity, and as an earnest of our thankfulness to our Heavenly Father, the giver of every good and perfect gift, and to every sympathizing man, woman, and child in the broad land who contributed in the least to lift the dark veil, and lighten the gloom which enveloped us, we desire that the page of history which records the ravages of the pestilence of 1878 may also record, of those who came to our rescue, that by their gracious charity they have to themselves "raised monuments more lasting than brazen statues, higher than the royal pyramids, which cannot be destroyed by wasting rains or the fury of the winds, by the series of the countless ages or the flight of eternal years."

The disagreement which has heretofore occasioned trouble and delay in both branches of Congress seems not to be as to the necessity of legislation, but as to the extent of the power of Congress; and with the hope that gentlemen will hereafter, when freed from the hubbub of this House, consider the subject in all its bearings more fully than is now necessary in the proposed half discharge of a great duty, I ask the attention of the House to this controverted point because I think additional legislation will be deemed necessary next session.

Must Congress subordinate its legislation to that of the States? I maintain that the Government is above and not below the States in this matter, and I submit that this position is in perfect harmony with a fair and reasonable interpretation of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, which confers upon Congress the right "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States."

A much narrower interpretation of this clause has been given in framing this bill than was necessary or proper; hence in passing it we will not have done our whole duty to protect the lives and prosperity of the people. If as the result of this failure another terrible epidemic occurs, such an interpretation after that will be so indignantly and universally condemned and rebuked that no man will thereafter favor it.

We go far in solving the power of the Government as to this matter when we have settled the meaning of the words "to regulate commerce." I maintain that elementary authority, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of this Government, leave no substantial ground for disagreement as to the true meaning of these words. Do they merely confer the power to regulate the exchange of merchandise? Does commerce mean simply the exchange of commodity for commodity, or has it a broader and fuller meaning? Does it not also comprehend intercourse? Is the contracted construction which is given to it by gentlemen who have hitherto opposed legislation by Congress reasonable, even if considered without the aid of law-writers or jurists?

I affirm that our text-books on the Constitution as well as the adjudications of the court of the last resort in this country, and our own common sense, all warrant me in maintaining that that narrow and limited meaning is unauthorized, and should be abandoned before our people are again stricken, and our industries again paralyzed.

Judge Story, in his Commentaries upon the Constitution, wrote upon this subject as follows:

> What is the constitutional meaning of the words "to regulate commerce," for the Constitution being (as has been aptly said) one of enumeration and not of definition, it becomes necessary in order to ascertain the extent of the power to ascertain the meaning of the words. The power is to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. The subject to be regulated is commerce. Is that limited to traffic, to buying and selling or the interchange of commodities? Or does it comprehend navigation and intercourse? If the former construction is adopted, then a general term applicable to many objects is restricted to one of its significations. If the latter, then a general term is retained in its general sense. To adopt the former without some guiding grounds furnished by the context, or the nature of the power, would be improper. The words being general the sense must be general also, and embrace all subjects comprehended under them, unless there be some obvious mischief or repugnance to other clauses to limit them. In the present case there is nothing to justify such a limitation. Commerce undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more. It is intercourse.—Story on Constitution, volume 11, section 1061.

Following that authority Mr. Justice Field, a democratic judge, and always jealous of the residuary rights and sovereignty of the States, speaking for a united bench in the case of Melton vs. The State of Missouri, on page 280, said:

> Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens or subjects of other countries and between the citizens of different States. The power to regulate it embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted. So far as some of these instruments are concerned and some subjects which are local in their operation, it has been held that the States may provide regulations until Congress acts with reference to them; but where the subject to which the power applies is national in its character, or of such a nature as to admit of uniformity of regulation, the power is exclusive of all State authority.

In the case before us "the subject to which the power applies is national in its character," and "admits of uniformity of regulation," hence the "power is exclusive of all State authority."

In the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, page 1, Chief-Justice Marshall construed the word regulate to imply "full power over the thing to be regulated, and to exclude the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing."

The Supreme Court in the cases of Henderson vs. The Mayor of New York and in the case of Chy Lung vs. Freeman in the State of California, both reported in 2 Otto, exhaustively pronounced its opinion touching this power of Congress. In the former case it will be remembered that the court was construing a statute in New York which provided that every master of a vessel, bringing foreign citizens into the port of New York, should execute a bond in a penalty of $500 conditioned that such persons should not become a charge upon the people of that State.

Under that law, so sweeping, and without discrimination as to who the persons were, the master of a vessel if he had brought Queen Victoria to this country, or any other crowned head of Europe, would have been required to give a bond conditioned as aforesaid. The Supreme Court, when asked by a sturdy Englishman, the master of a vessel, to consider the constitutionality of this law, promptly declared it was unconstitutional, because the State of New York had undertaken "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," which power was reserved alone for the United States.

In a recent discussion on this very question in the other end of this Capitol, a Senator from that State took the ground that if the statute under consideration had applied to certain classes of persons, namely, criminals, paupers, &c., it would have been free from constitutional objection; but even this position is untenable, as we see in the very next case, decided, perhaps, one month afterward, and by the same judge who delivered the preceding opinion—I refer to the case of Chy Lung vs. Freeman, from California—it was held that the law of that State, which referred only to foreign criminals, paupers, lewd women, lunatics, &c., was unconstitutional. The following language appears in this opinion:

> The passage of laws which concern the admission of citizens and subjects of foreign nations to our shores belongs to Congress and not to the States. It has the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." The responsibility for the character of those regulations and for the manner of their execution belongs solely to the National Government. If it be otherwise, a single State can, at her pleasure, embroil us in disastrous quarrels with other nations.—Chy Lung vs. Freedman, 2 Otto, 280.

So we learn from those two decisions, of the highest expounders of our Constitution and laws, that the statutes of New York and California were void because they undertook to regulate commerce, and that the power to prescribe the terms, conditions, and regulations upon which foreigners may be allowed to enter this Government is lodged in Congress alone. The views set forth in these cases are reaffirmed and fortified with further reasoning by the Supreme Court in its opinion in the case of the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company vs. Husen, in 5 Otto.

These authoritative utterances seem to be decisive of the position that the Government is possessed of supreme power in the important work of prohibiting the introduction into our country of contagious and epidemic diseases. If the Government is above the States as to this, then by the same article of the Constitution it is supreme so far as interstate commerce is concerned; the power extends to the embargo of vessels and the regulation of internal trade, reaching individuals engaged in such commerce, persons being transported, and also merchandise and freights. Mr. Justice Marshall said:

> Congress may control the State laws so far as it may be necessary to control them for the regulation of commerce. A law of a State made in pursuance of its acknowledged powers must give way when in conflict with a law of Congress made within the powers of the Constitution.—9 Wharton, 196.

Of course I concede that the States can and should pass sanitary and quarantine laws, but such laws cannot limit or disturb the constitutional power of Congress. The overshadowing reason why I favor the full exercise of the authority existing in Congress is that I believe State laws are insecure, even when faithfully executed. In such an epidemic as we had last year the contagion is likely to be carried more or less along the countless lines of railroads and rivers upon which our commerce is borne, despite the vigilance and good faith of State officials.

I do not believe that any danger to the States can be reasonably apprehended from the exercise of this power by the Federal Government. There is no centralization in it, because the rights of the States are not disturbed to their detriment. There is no departure from true State-rights doctrine. I have always been and shall ever be in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution in all its parts, and I yield to no man in my desire to conform to its provisions; but I repeat that I find no provision, sentence, or word in that instrument which at all collides with the views I have endeavored to submit.

Just here I will take the liberty to read a part of a letter which reached me this morning from one of the most distinguished lawyers of this country, a judge for many years of the supreme court of Mississippi, and always a Jeffersonian democrat, and an intimate friend and supporter of Mr. Jefferson Davis. I refer to Hon. A. M. Clayton, who remained at his home in the vicinity of Holly Springs during the prevalence of last year's plague, and who feels deep solicitude as to our action. He says:

I have always been a State-rights man, but to say that the principles of that party forbid the exercise of a police power by the General Government absolutely necessary for the preservation of the health and the lives of the people is pushing the doctrine to a most unjustifiable extent. Congress has the power "to regulate commerce"—the foreign in a sole and unrestricted sense. To say that it may regulate the importation of all tropical products except disease and death is an absurdity. It may legally say, for the safety of the people, that vessels from ports infected with disease of a contagious character shall only be admitted into our ports at certain times and seasons and under certain conditions. This is not excluding commerce, and ought not to disturb a State-rights man of the strictest sense.

To those who do not concur with me as to the power of Congress (and I am conscious of the fact that there are democrats upon this floor who have heretofore expressed very different views) I desire to address this inquiry: whence comes the authority of this Government to fix rules and regulations for freight and passenger crafts? Must it not be conceded that it is under that article which authorizes Congress to "regulate commerce," internal as well as foreign? From the foundation of the Government down to this time Congress has, without dispute from any quarter, required for the benefit of commerce, for the protection of life and property, the examination of the machinery of all steam-vessels, and also that gunpowder, nitroglycerine, &c., shall not be carried on passenger vessels.

When Congress has the undisputed right to so regulate commerce that passengers may travel in safety, how can it be questioned that Congress may under that clause prescribe such regulations of commerce as will afford complete protection to passengers, not only against defective machinery and explosive fluids, but also against deadly contagion, whose victims are only to be numbered by its spread, and whose damage to the commerce of the country cannot be estimated.

Persons who are acquainted with the mortuary reports of the plague of last year, and who appreciate the horrors of yellow fever, would all doubtless infinitely prefer the dangers incident to a voyage upon a craft propelled by condemned machinery, and filled with forbidden articles, rather than to encounter the hazards of exposure to yellow fever upon a vessel in other respects entirely safe and seaworthy. With all due deference I must say that it seems to be quite absurd to hold that although Congress may pass navigation laws declaring to masters of vessels that they shall not endanger their passengers by what they carry below, still it must leave masters of vessels free to carry contagion, however malignant or deadly, above, and in the midst of their passengers, anywhere and everywhere they please.

Is it any stretch of the Constitution, or our common sense, to hold that masters, or others, shall not transport into our borders, or along our rivers, or lines of interstate travel men, women, or children who are afflicted with an epidemic and contagious disease? Shall we hold that the only products of tropical regions which we cannot exclude from our borders, or cannot endeavor to control, when imported, are death and disease? I hope not. And in conclusion I desire to remark that I hope Congress will be prepared when it becomes necessary hereafter to legislate again upon this subject to take more advanced ground than it has seen proper to do in the pending bill.

Mr. RICE. I did not suppose that it would devolve upon me to assume the somewhat ungracious task of opposing this bill which enlists in its behalf the sympathies of every generous heart. I had supposed that some other gentleman had prepared himself to present the constitutional argument against it and to assert that according to the decisions of the courts of the United States we have no authority to establish quarantine laws. If the constitutional authority of the Government can be vindicated in this respect, if the difficulties which I seem to see in my way can be removed, no one more heartily than myself would vote in support of this bill.

But, Mr. Speaker, I come from a section where great labor and great pains have been taken to establish thorough quarantine laws. It has been admitted in this discussion that the great city of New York has already succeeded in establishing quarantine laws which are substantially a protection against the introduction of contagious diseases. It is so with the city of Boston. It is so with the other great commercial cities of the North. They have already, Mr. Speaker, at great pains and great expense, thrown around themselves the protection of laws and regulations through which this insidious pestilence cannot break. They believe that it is the right, the privilege, the prerogative of the States to make these regulations, and that they are not to be broken down by any laws or by any general effort that may be made in that direction by the United States Government, and therefore, in protection of the States which have established these regulations, in defense of the rights which are guaranteed to the States by the Constitution, I find it my duty to oppose this bill.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I have hastily opened the statutes where are the provisions established heretofore by Congress in regard to quarantine. I find that the law, the only statute in regard thereto, comes to us from 1799, and that is my recollection. Sir, I do not desire to make the statement positively, because I have had no time to verify my recollection; but it is my recollection that that statute was enacted when the pestilence was sweeping over the land, when the great cities of the country were exposed to the ravages of Asiatic cholera; and it is my recollection that there was then an attempt made to see whether the General Government could not do something to protect these cities against pestilence. and the fathers of the Constitution in that early Congress assembled decided that all that the General Government could do was to provide that the officers of the General Government should confer with the officers of the State governments in making effectual the provisions and regulations which the States had established in regard to quarantine.

Up to this date the General Government has never yet gone further than to say to its revenue officers and its other officers, Obey the laws which the States have made; aid the State officers to carry out the State laws. That is as far as the General Government can go.

My friend from Michigan, [Mr. MCGOWAN,] to whose admirable speech I listened with so much pleasure, hoping that he would meet and refute the objection which rests in my mind, puts this authority of Congress upon the general right of Congress to make regulations in regard to commerce, foreign and interstate. I agree with all that he has said as to that authority. But I ask him whether the decisions of the Supreme Court of this country, from the beginning down to the present time, do not hold that that power of Congress is absolute and exclusive, that the States have no authority to make regulations in regard to commerce? And have not the legislative provisions of my own State in regard to the importation of liquors, and of the State of Maryland, and of New York in regard to head money imposed upon immigrants, all been declared by the courts to be illegal and void because the right to make regulations as to commerce is exclusively and absolutely within the domain of Congress?

Has not Congress, in this statute to which I have referred, recognized the fact that it is for the States to make these quarantine laws? And do not the decisions to which I have referred, all down through their course, bear the statement upon almost every page that these quarantine laws and regulations are police matters, to be attended to by the States and not by the General Government? In the passenger cases, those cases which were decided after such elaborate argument, and in which the nine judges of the Supreme Court gave separate opinions, five of them holding that the power of Congress to regulate commerce was absolute and exclusive, the opinion of the court was to the following effect:

That the States of this Union may, in the exercise of their police powers, pass quarantine and health laws, interdicting vessels coming from foreign ports, or ports within the United States, from landing passengers and goods, prescribe the places and time for vessels to quarantine, and impose penalties upon persons for violating the same; and that such laws, though affecting commerce in its transit, are not regulations of commerce prescribing terms upon which merchandise and persons shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, but precautionary regulations to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from introducing disease into the ports to which they are bound; and that the States may, in the exercise of such police power, without any violation of the power in Congress to regulate commerce, exact from the owner or consignee of a quarantined vessel, and from the passengers on board of her, such fees as will pay to the State the cost of their detention and of the purification of the vessel, cargo, and apparel of the persons on board.

This case is full of these dicta; and the other cases, Gibbon vs. Ogden, Brown vs. Maryland, and other cases, have also the same dicta.

Mr. COX. To what case does the gentleman refer?

Mr. RICE. To the passenger cases reported in 7 Howard, in which I think there is the fullest statement of the law and of the history of the legislation of the country and of the States upon this subject of which I have any knowledge anywhere. In this very case, where the court finds that the power of Congress over commerce is exclusive, is the statement which I have read that the power to make quarantine regulations is a police power which belongs to the States.

Am I wrong, therefore, until these dicta have been overcome, if not by direct decision then in some other way, in standing for the right of my State and for the right of other States to preserve themselves by the laws which they have established, and which thus far have been sufficient for their protection? Congress has the right to order its officers to enforce the regulations of the various States. Let the State of the gentleman who has charge of this bill make provisions as stringent as it may——

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. RICE. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Suppose that Tennessee does make stringent health or quarantine regulations; and then suppose that the State of Mississippi does not make such regulations: how is Tennessee to keep this pestilence out of its borders?

Mr. RICE. By doing as do the towns in my own State when the small-pox is in the surrounding towns—prevent any one from entering from the contagious district.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. By what authority?

Mr. RICE. By the authority which the State has to make these regulations.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Another question?

Mr. RICE. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Have we in New York or in Tennessee, for instance, any authority for stopping a steamboat loaded with yellow-fever patients, or a train of railroad cars having small-pox patients on board—have we any authority to stop that steamboat or that railroad train until it reaches the Tennessee line?

Mr. RICE. Tennessee has the most undoubted authority to make laws upon the subject.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. To operate before the railroad train or the steamboat reaches the State line?

Mr. RICE. When it reaches the State line.

Mr. McGOWAN. The danger has then attached.

Mr. RICE. Have your police on the State line.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The State is open and we want the nation to close the doors.

Mr. RICE. So are the States of the North open; yet do not they stop vessels and stop cars and stop everything upon the State line, and there subject them to examination and detention as is provided by their laws?

Mr. McGOWAN. I desire to interrupt the gentleman for a question before he leaves this part of the subject. He affirms the supreme power of the General Government over commerce, and from this deduces the conclusion that this Government has no power over quarantine laws. Now I wish to ask him whether the General Government, having power over commerce, has not, as a mere incident to that power, the authority to regulate manufactures and encourage agriculture?

Mr. RICE. To a certain extent undoubtedly.

Mr. McGOWAN. Then may not the General Government have in the same way, as an incident to the power over commerce, the authority to adopt regulations with reference to health and sanitary matters, so far as they affect commerce?

Mr. RICE. The General Government has attempted to do that by requiring its revenue officers to waive even the strict enforcement of the revenue laws. At various times instructions have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury to the revenue officers to waive the requirements of the revenue laws in order that State regulations in regard to quarantine might be enforced.

Mr. McGOWAN. Then the General Government may go to whatever extent is necessary for the preservation of its commerce?

Mr. RICE. I am glad to have my friend suggest these points, because it is only for truth we are all seeking in this matter. There can be no question that the revenue officers of the General Government, who are charged with the supervision as to the arrival of vessels and the introduction of merchandise, might possibly come into conflict with the health officers of the State, who are charged with preventing the introduction of anything diseased or dangerous within the State borders. But, as I have said, the General Government has instructed its officers to concur and co-operate with the State officers in this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to make any remarks on this bill. I would not have done so had any one else suggested these objections. I am not certain that there may not be something to obviate the force of these decisions, which seem to me potent and conclusive; but unless something can be found of which I am not aware, I must vote against this bill as trenching upon rights guaranteed to the States by the Constitution, which have been recognized hitherto in the legislation of Congress and in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the nation.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question before he takes his seat. I have not had the benefit of hearing all the discussion on this question, but have listened only to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. Now, I wish to ask him whether the Federal Government has not the power to make quarantine regulations upon its own ships or dockyards or other Government property?

Mr. RICE. I do not know why it may not.

Mr. WILSON. Now, I wish to ask whether the State has power to prevent a Government ship, running under Government quarantine regulations, from entering a harbor of the State? And if the Government has this power to establish quarantine regulations, would there be co-operative regulations between the State governments and the Federal Government?

Mr. RICE. I will answer the gentleman. There is no doubt that this power must be exclusive and supreme. If Congress has the right to make these quarantine regulations the States have not that right. State quarantine regulations cannot exist in the face of national quarantine regulations. The one authority must give way to the other. If the nation makes these regulations the State cannot; if the State makes them the nation cannot. The power is of such a nature that it cannot be exercised concurrently by the State government and the National Government—one must overtop and override the other. Now, then, though the National Government can control its own vessels, yet if a national vessel sought to enter the harbor of New York in defiance of the quarantine regulations and laws of the State of New York the State could stop it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to examine this bill until it was read here this morning. Any remarks I may make on it, therefore, are only those suggested by a mere casual inspection. I dislike to enter upon the discussion of such a measure as this without opportunity for more mature consideration than I have had in this case.

I shall when the bill is taken up by sections offer some amendments to which I now desire to call attention. Three of these amendments are not very material; they relate to subjects of no great importance; and it is to me a matter of very little consequence whether they be adopted or not.

Section 2 looks to the President detailing medical officers to act in foreign ports. It provides that—

> All such vessels shall be required to obtain from the consul, vice-consul, or other consular officer of the United States at the port of departure, or from the medical officer, where such officer has been detailed by the President for that purpose, a certificate, &c.

I propose to add after the word "detailed" in the fourth line the words "or designated;" to add after the word "detail" in line 17 the words "or designate;" and after the word "detailed" in line 21 the words "or designated." I propose these amendments for this reason, that "detail" under our practice means the assignment of an officer in the service to the performance of a duty.

Hence it is that the President under these provisions might detail from the medical corps six officers to be sent abroad to make these certificates. You will see it will involve the expense incident to sending abroad six medical officers to give these certificates required under the section. We may have American physicians resident there, or there may be natives of those countries who would be trusted by our Government and consular officers; and, if so, why should we send from here commissioned officers of the medical corps to issue certificates to vessels in foreign countries? Why should we incur that unnecessary expense? Why not leave it to the discretion of the President to detail them if that be necessary, or to designate them, if that be more convenient and less expensive? That is the object of the first amendment, and it has reference to the question of expense; and in these times it is well for us to look to the curtailment of expense even in small things.

The next amendment which I shall propose will be in section 3, to strike out all from line 7 to line 31.

Mr. MANNING. I do not understand the bill the gentleman from Texas is now considering is the one before the House for action at this time, but that on the contrary the printed bill from which he is reading has been so much amended it does not at all agree with the bill upon the Speaker's desk.

Mr. REAGAN. I am acting under the supposition that this is the bill now before the House.

Mr. MANNING. It is not. The bill before the House is in manuscript yet, and it was suggested early in the day that it should be printed before we were called upon either to discuss or act upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) The Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table and substituted for the House bill.

Mr. GOODE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that his amendment be withheld until we take up the bill and consider it section by section for amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not offering my amendments now, but merely explaining them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments only can be offered when the sections are reached to which they apply.

Mr. REAGAN. I was only calling attention in this general debate to the amendments I shall propose at the proper time when the bill shall be taken up under the five-minute rule. One is to strike out all from line 7 to line 31 in section 3 of the bill, and I do not think that section as it stands differs from the bill as it was sent to us from the Senate. Section 3 provides, in the first place, down to line 7, that the National Board of Health shall co-operate with and, so far as it lawfully may, aid State and municipal boards of health and sanitary associations in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations of such boards and associations to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, and into one State from another. That portion of the section I do not propose to interfere with, but then follow the words which I do propose to strike out, and which I will read:

> And at such ports and places within the United States as have no quarantine regulations under State authority, where such regulations are, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, necessary to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, and at such ports and places within the United States where quarantine regulations exist under the authority of the State which in the opinion of the National Board of Health, are not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States, or into one State from another, the National Board of Health shall report the facts to the President of the United States, who shall, if, in his judgment, it is necessary and proper, order said Board of Health to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, which, when so made and approved by the President, shall be promulgated by the National Board of Health and enforced by the sanitary authorities of the States, where the State authorities will undertake to execute and enforce them; but if the State authorities shall fail or refuse to enforce said rules and regulations, the President may detail an officer or appoint a proper person for that purpose.

I propose, sir, to strike those words out because I am unable to concur in the views expressed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McGOWAN] and as I understood by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] in the opinion that under the power to regulate commerce among the States the United States Government can establish and execute sanitary and police regulations. I cannot go as far as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] who has just taken his seat, in assuming that under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations we cannot provide through our consular agencies or otherwise the means to prevent the introduction of epidemic diseases from foreign countries into ours. I say I cannot go that far. I have not investigated the subject very closely, and am inclined at present without investigation to believe that power does exist and may lawfully be exercised. But when we have reached the United States I must doubt whether the power to regulate commerce among the States is sufficient to cover the right to provide sanitary and police regulations for the exclusion of diseases coming from one State into another. It is on that ground I am inclined to make the motion to strike out that part of the section. If the motion should fail I shall then propose two other amendments to strike out parts of that which I propose here to strike out. The first is to strike out all after the word "another," in line 13, page 3, section 3, down to the word "another" in line 18. The words I propose to strike out are as follows:

And at such ports and places within the United States where quarantine regulations exist under the authority of the State which in the opinion of the National Board of Health are not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States or into one State from another.

And accompanying that I will move to strike out all after the word "them," in line 28, down to the end of the thirty-first line, namely, these words:

But if the State authorities shall fail or refuse to enforce said rules and regulations, the President may detail an officer or appoint a proper person for that purpose

From these suggestions, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that my view of what ought to be done is to limit the action and operations of the Federal Government to the exclusion from our ports of diseases coming from foreign countries, to leave the State quarantine regulations in full force independent of the power of the Federal Government, but to authorize the Federal Government, so far as it may do so in the terms used in the first part of section 3, to co-operate with the State and local quarantine associations for the exclusion of diseases coming from foreign countries.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. There are only seventeen States in the Union that have quarantine laws. How will it be with those that have none?

Mr. REAGAN. I feel compelled to make the same answer substantially as I understood was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] that the States which are not upon the seaboard, the States which are inland, would have to rely upon State authority to prevent the introduction of epidemic diseases. I do that because, as I mentioned at the outset, I doubt the authority of the Federal Government, under the power to regulate commerce between the States, to make sanitary and police regulations.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That is not an answer to my question. I understood the gentleman to recognize the power of the Federal Government to legislate in aid of State authorities in respect of public health. Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. REAGAN. I said I would recognize as much as is embraced in the first part of section 3, which I will read:

That the National Board of Health shall co-operate with and, so far as it lawfully may, aid State and municipal boards of health and sanitary associations in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations of such boards and associations to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries.

And this calls to my mind what I did not notice, that this is followed by the words:

And into one State from another,

Which, in my view, should be stricken out.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it would not be competent for the Federal Government to aid State authority in preventing the introduction of diseases from one State into another?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not. What I propose would limit the Federal authority to co-operating with the State authorities in preventing the introduction of epidemic diseases from foreign countries.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman from Texas would not propose to legislate in aid of States unless there was constitutional authority for Congress to do so. If, then, the gentleman concedes that, where is the cause of the distinction in his mind which would allow him to legislate as to the regulation of commerce from abroad but would exclude the power of Congress to legislate on interior commerce?

Mr. REAGAN. I wish the gentleman to understand me. I agree that Congress may under this power to regulate commerce with foreign countries exercise its power to prevent the introduction of epidemic diseases from foreign countries. That is, it may do for that purpose whatever can be done between the foreign port and our port; and if the local health authorities have regulations which are intended for the same purpose, to the extent that may be convenient and necessary I would recognize the power of the Federal Government to co-operate with them in the exclusion of these diseases coming from foreign countries. That is as far as I propose to go. While I recognize that, I do not in my view of the Constitution understand or believe that under the power to regulate commerce among the States the Federal Government has the power to adopt sanitary regulations and police regulations as a part of the power to regulate commerce among the States. I do not think it can be extended to or be embraced under the power which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the States.

Besides this I wish to say that in the prevention and arrest of this terrible scourge I do not believe that any general regulation, that any regulation by the Federal Government which it can possibly institute or execute, is equal in its efficiency and safety to the people, to the local vigilance of the people themselves who are interested. Any system to be carried out by people remote from the seat of danger whose lives and whose property are not immediately in danger will lack that element of ceaseless vigilance and energetic action which always springs from the necessity of the community endangered by these diseases. Now, in the terrible scourge which spread such calamity and disaster all over a large region of country last year, the State of Texas, lying along the Gulf border, extending as far south as any State except the most southern point of Florida, kept out the disease of yellow fever by the vigor of its quarantine by sea and land. It is true it interrupted commerce, it is true it interrupted travel; but it saved the people from the calamity of that terrible disease.

Mr. MANNING. So these regulations on the part of States, in your opinion, can be made efficient without legislation by Congress?

Mr. REAGAN. I do believe they can be made efficient. But I do not wish to be understood as saying that I would not ask the aid of the Federal Government, as this bill provides, in co-operating through consular agencies at foreign ports and otherwise in warning the people of the existence of danger and its approach, and in aiding thereby in guarding against the danger. But when it comes to be within our own ports, I do not think any agency is equal to that of the people themselves directly concerned; and besides this, if I am right in that opinion—of course it is the opinion of but one person, predicated, however, upon some experience—I confess, while I would go a long way in protecting the country against epidemic diseases whether cholera or yellow fever, I do not want to trench upon the Constitution; I do not want, if it can be avoided, and if we can effect our purpose without it, to create a large and extensive bureau of the Government to do that which under the Constitution it seems to me we cannot properly do.

One of the reasons I have for proposing to amend this section is that, in my judgment, it will be found that the operations of that section give them supervision over the different localities in the different States, to determine when they want quarantine regulations, and determine whether these quarantine regulations are sufficient or insufficient, and when they are not sufficient to proceed by the authority of the Federal Government, if that would enable them to do just what experience in my judgment shows they will do, and build up an expensive bureau of the government that would be a great expense to the country with but little protection to the people. If Congress has concurrent authority with the States to adopt sanitary and police regulations in the States to prevent the spread of epidemic diseases, though State action may be valid until Congress acts, when Congress does act and makes such regulations, then the State regulations must cease to be valid and the regulations made by Congress will alone be in force. The two systems cannot be in force at the same time. This is a fearful length to ask us to go.

I hope no one will think that I misunderstand or underrate the great calamity which has befallen our country. No one can overestimate the miseries, the losses, and desolation that has fallen upon the people of a large section of the country from this cause; but while such calamities are to be avoided and prevented, if there is a power of preventing them, it seems to me that for the purpose of accomplishing a great good it is not necessary to violate the Constitution, and in so doing to take away the inducement to local vigilance in the prevention of the introduction of this disease.

I have occupied more time than I intended to when I arose. I merely intended to indicate the amendments I proposed to offer. I do not wish it to be understood that I desire to defeat this bill. On the contrary, I have a great desire that it shall pass with the amendments I have indicated.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman has said that State regulations could be made effective, and that the twenty-odd States which have now no such regulations can promptly make the necessary laws. Now, I want to call your attention to one State, Florida, whose great extent of coast and limited revenue render it impossible to enforce quarantine regulations so as to afford protection against the importation of any contagious disease. It must be borne in mind that this State is nearer to Cuba, from which country yellow fever is generally imported, than any other State of this Union—so close that the waters between these points can almost be spanned by a fishing rod; and that it was admitted by Senator CALL from that State, in a discussion upon this question a few days ago in the Senate, that it was utterly impracticable for Florida to keep this disease from her borders. So we see in this case that Federal legislation is indispensable.

Now, sir, this disease does not respect persons. It does not respect democrats, republicans, or nationals. The further North it goes the more malignant the type of the disease, although it is of tropical origin; and if it gets into the State of Florida it may spread throughout the country, and there is no power in that State to keep it out. What, then, becomes of the position of the gentleman that we are to rely upon the State authorities for protection from this disease?

Mr. REAGAN. In answer to the gentleman from Mississippi I say that I do not oppose anything nor do I advocate anything that will oppose the prevention of the introduction of this disease from a foreign country, and the fact may be as the Senator from Florida has stated. If that is true, we have all the machinery here that he asks for, and that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] asks for, for that purpose.

I am not questioning that portion of the bill which has for its object to prevent the introduction of epidemic diseases from other countries; but only that portion of it which has reference to quarantine regulations within the States. I have not said one word in detriment of that provision which looks to the exclusion of epidemic diseases from out ports, and I hope that it will be passed, because I believe it would be a valuable auxiliary in aiding the States to keep the disease out.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman, it seems to me, has said much against the power of Congress upon this subject, and he agrees substantially with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] who, although a republican, turns up in this discussion as the champion of State-rights doctrine. The argument of the gentleman from Texas I submit has a tendency to damage the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I had no purpose to damage the bill by anything I said. My purpose was to make it efficient; one that cannot be overturned in the courts of the country; one that can be administered without unnecessary and useless expense.

I would encourage the people to apply local vigilance, and encourage them to that self-reliance which has always been the greatest protection against these evils. If in this I happen to agree in any measure with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] who is spoken of as a republican, I am very glad for once to find a republican agrees with me on a constitutional question, especially as republicans are generally thought to give large latitude in constitutional construction.

My views relative to the Constitution have never been circumscribed by party platforms and political bias. I hold that under the Constitution, which each of us has taken an oath to support, each member must decide such questions for himself, and if we conscientiously regard that obligation, we must look to the Constitution and to Him to whom we took that oath for our faithful keeping of it.

Mr. GOODE. I no not rise to discuss this bill at any length. The Committee on Epidemic Diseases were of the opinion that at this stage of the session, and after the elaborate discussion had on this subject at the last session, and during the present session of the Senate, that any extended discussion on this bill would be unnecessary. I desire simply to reply in a few words to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] I did not have the pleasure of hearing everything that fell from his lips. So far as I understand him, I think he misunderstands somewhat the scope and design of this bill.

I understand my friend to hold that the bill if passed by the House as passed by the Senate will infringe upon and supersede the State quarantine regulations. Now, I sympathize with the gentleman in much that he has said so far as I understood him, but I suggest that on a careful examination of the bill you will find the bill not liable to the criticism he has made upon it.

The bill, if I understand it, provides that the National Board of Health lately created shall co-operate with and aid the State and municipal boards in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations adopted by the different State governments to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE. I merely want to ask the gentleman if section 3, giving to the National Board of Health the authority to make regulations when the local regulations are not sufficient, in their judgment; and again, to make such regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such disease, &c., does not give to the National Board of Health the authority to supersede and override the regulations of State boards?

Mr. GOODE. I do not so understand it; if I did I am free to say I would not vote for the bill.

Mr. RICE. One word further.

Mr. GOODE. Certainly.

Mr. RICE. If the gentleman will amend that section so as to make it conform to the construction which he puts upon it, he will do very much toward removing my objection to this bill.

Mr. GOODE. As I was about to say, the bill provides, in the first place, that this national board shall co-operate with and aid the State and municipal boards in carrying out their quarantine regulations. There is no objection to that on the part of my friend. The bill goes further and provides that the national board shall establish rules and regulations at such ports and places within the United States as have no quarantine regulations under State authority. As I understand there is no objection to that.

But the objection made by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] and by my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is this: the bill provides that wherever the regulations adopted by the different State governments shall in the opinion of the National Board of Health prove inefficient, then it is competent for the national board to adopt independent rules and regulations to aid the State organizations in keeping out disease. Now, it is my opinion that does not supersede the State regulations; it does not set them aside; it does not undertake to take from the State authorities the power to do whatever they are able to do to keep out disease. But this bill proceeds upon the doctrine laid down by Chief-Justice Marshall in the celebrated case of Gibbon vs. Ogden, to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCGOWAN] referred in his very admirable address this morning; that is, that Congress may enact supplemental legislation; that Congress may order its officers to assist the State officers in carrying out State regulations; that Congress may enact provisions in aid of the provisions adopted by the State.

Now, that is, according to my conception, the whole scope of this bill. In other words, it is supplemental, it is auxiliary, it is in aid of the State governments in their efforts to keep out disease. I yield to no gentleman upon this floor in support of the doctrine that some powers belong to the National Government and some powers to the State governments; and that among the powers confided to the State governments is the power to preserve and guard and protect the lives and the health of its people.

I go further; I would be unwilling to strike down the systems which have been adopted by the States, not only upon the ground of principle but upon the ground of policy and expediency. Some of the States of this Union, notably among them the State of New York, have quarantine systems which are the results of long years of experience. They have been found to be efficient; they have been found to be entirely efficacious, I believe, in keeping out disease.

Now, I agree with the gentleman that it would be eminently unwise, in my judgment it would be eminently unsafe, particularly at this juncture, when the sickly season is already upon us, to embark upon any new experiment and to interfere with and attempt to supersede State systems of quarantine which have heretofore answered the purpose for which they were intended. I do not understand that this bill contemplates any such purpose.

I understand that this bill is designed to be auxiliary to the States, to recognize the State systems where they exist, to occupy the ground where it is unoccupied. It recognizes the State regulations where they exist, and where none exist it proposes to establish regulations. And where, in the opinion of the national board, a State system is found to be inefficient, it is intended that the national board shall come in and adopt regulations in aid of the State.

Now, when this matter was under discussion at the last session of Congress the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] stated what I believe to be the true doctrine on this subject. Speaking of the Senate bill then pending, he said:

> The Senate bill, without disturbing any of the local quarantine regulations of the States, gives the power to the national board to establish national quarantine regulations wherever none exist, and to apply the outer circle, the quarantine power of the United States superimposed upon or rather outside of the quarantine regulations of the States. When a vessel passes our line of pickets, if the State authorities wish to keep it out, very well; we do not interfere with them; we only say we will establish a skirmish line a little farther out toward the enemy's camp.

That is the theory of this bill. We recognize and respect the quarantine systems of the States where they exist; where none exist we establish regulations; and where those in existence are found to be insufficient for the purpose, the national board comes in to the aid of the State government and becomes an outer guard as it were, nearer to the line of the enemy's camp, in aid of the great object which the State has in view, the protection of the lives and the health of its people.

Mr. HASKELL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks it competent for Congress to empower a health board to make rules and regulations the violation of which shall be prosecuted in the courts of law and punished with heavy penalties as misdemeanors or crimes?

Mr. GOODE. I will say to my friend from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] that this bill is the result of a compromise. It is perhaps the most delicate and difficult subject upon which the Congress of the United States ever undertook to legislate. If the gentleman will read all the decisions and then undertake to write down in words exactly where the national power ends and where the State power begins upon this subject of quarantine, he will accomplish in my judgment what nobody else has yet accomplished.

Now, in reply to the gentleman I will say that the point he suggests was one upon which as a member of the committee I had difficulty; I sympathize with the view which the gentleman has indicated; but I found it necessary to yield something of my own individual opinions upon this subject. We want to do whatever we can to prevent the recurrence of yellow fever and to save our people from its ravages. I am not willing to go home and say that we have left undone anything which could be done in order to prevent the recurrence of yellow fever during the coming season. This matter was under discussion in the co-ordinate branch of Congress, and the explanation given there was that it is not competent to punish in the Federal courts the violation of State regulations as such, yet the Federal Government may adopt, as it does in this bill, the State regulations pro tanto as Federal regulations, and to this extent provide for the punishment of any violation of them.

Mr. HASKELL. That is not the proposition I wanted to get at. I do not raise the question of the jurisdiction of the State government as compared with that of the National Government, but I ask whether it is competent for Congress to delegate to an executive board of three men the power to provide a set of rules for the government of American commerce, the violation of which shall subject the violators to punishment by fine or imprisonment, when no such statutory provision now exists on the part of either the State or the General Government?

Mr. GOODE. It will be observed by my friend, if he will examine this bill, that these rules and regulations are to be subject to the approval of the President. Besides, there is ample precedent for the proposition which he has suggested. Every day violations of regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury are punished in the courts in pursuance of a Federal statute.

This is perhaps the most difficult question upon which any body of men have ever been called upon to legislate. To define precisely the domain of the Federal power and the domain of the State power in regard to this matter is more than any one has yet been able to do. This bill is the result of a compromise. We all had to concede something. I yield to no man in my devotion to the rights of the States. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that there are still some rights left to the States, and among them the right to protect the health and lives of their people.

I do not go so far as my friend from Michigan [Mr. MCGOWAN] did this morning in reference to the power to regulate commerce. Congress can regulate commerce. Regulate it how? Regulate it by law. By what kind of law? By any law that is "necessary and proper." "Necessary and proper" for what end? "Necessary and proper" to regulate commerce, and in the language of Judge Story no law can be necessary and proper unless it is bona fide appropriate to the end in view; and I maintain that no law of Congress passed under the commercial power would be proper which undertook to supersede the quarantine regulations of the States. I do not understand this bill as doing any such thing. I repeat that, as I understand the measure and as our committee understood it, it is supplemental legislation in aid of the State. We recognize the State systems where they exist. Where the ground is entirely unoccupied we confer upon this board the power to make regulations; and where the State system is entirely inefficient we clothe the board with power to make auxiliary rules and regulations by way of helping the State out of the difficulty.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Suppose the board created by this act should come in conflict with a State board of quarantine, which is paramount in authority?

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say that, in my judgment, if the national board should undertake to supersede and set aside the quarantine regulations adopted by the State government within the limits of State jurisdiction, the State authority would be paramount. But where the national board may adopt regulations outside of the State jurisdiction and a conflict ensues the national authority would be paramount.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then, in the gentleman's opinion, is not a large portion of this bill unconstitutional because it gives to the national board the power, if it deems proper to exercise it, to control and overrule the State authorities and makes this national board supreme?

Mr. GOODE. Not at all. This bill, as I am seeking to explain, respects the quarantine regulations of the States where they exist. Where none exist it authorizes the national board to establish them, and where State regulations already existing are found to be inefficient the national board is authorized to come in in aid of the State board and adopt what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] calls the "outer circle."

Now I beg the indulgence of the House for one moment while I read a single extract from the opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall in the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, a decision which has been followed from that day to this. I undertake to say that in all the cases referred to here—Henderson vs. the State of New York, the case of Chy Lung vs. Freeman, from the State of California, the passenger cases, the case of Hazen vs. the State of Missouri, in regard to the introduction of cattle from Texas—I say that in all these decisions since the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and coming down as late as 5 Otto, the Supreme Court of the United States has invariably respected and indorsed the views taken by Chief-Justice Marshall in that celebrated case.

And I want the House to hear a single extract from that opinion:

> The acts of Congress, passed in 1796 and 1799, empowering and directing the officers of the General Government to conform to and assist in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of a State, proceed, it is said, upon the idea that these laws are constitutional. It is undoubtedly true that they do proceed upon that idea, and the constitutionality of such laws has never, so far as we are informed, been denied. But they do not imply an acknowledgment that a State may rightfully regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the States, for they do not imply that such laws are an exercise of that power or enacted with a view to it. On the contrary they are treated as quarantine and health laws, are so denominated in the acts of Congress, and are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State to provide for the health of its citizens. But as it was apparent that some of the provisions made for this purpose, and in virtue of this power, might interfere with and be affected by the laws of the United States made for the regulation of commerce, Congress, in that spirit of harmony and conciliation which ought always to characterize the conduct of governments standing in the relation which that of the Union and those of the States bear to each other, has directed its officers to aid in the execution of these laws, and has, in some measure, adapted its own legislation to this object by making provisions in aid of those of the States. But in making these provisions the opinion is unequivocally manifested that Congress may control the State laws so far as it may be necessary to control them for the regulation of commerce.

Now, that is the doctrine of this bill. Quarantine and health laws belong primarily to the State. Judge Marshal said it is part of the great mass of powers reserved to the States, but he adds that in that spirit of comity and in that spirit of conciliation which have always characterized governments standing in the relation that the Federal and State governments do in our complex system of government Congress may direct, and Congress has in the acts of 1796 and 1799 directed, its own officers to aid the States in enforcing its own regulations of quarantine, and it has gone further, as we propose in this bill, and enacted provisions in aid of the provisions of the State government. That is all; and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the terrible calamity which befell this people last summer, and in view of the paramount necessity and solemn duty resting upon this House to do all which in it lies to prevent the recurrence of the yellow fever—I do trust gentlemen will not be disposed to quibble on these minor points. I hope they will meet the committee in that spirit which actuated its members, inasmuch as we had to defer to each other and compromise and surrender some of those views with which we have grown up from our childhood. I say I trust such a spirit may actuate this body and this bill may be adopted as the only one which can be under the circumstances. Mr. Burke said that true statesmanship consists in adapting ourselves to the conditions by which we are surrounded. We find ourselves threatened with a terrible calamity, and I trust that the spirit and temper of this body may accord with those which have governed the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me for a few remarks.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I should yield to the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure, but I have not control of the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized and will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I think I am justified in saying there is no disposition on this side of the House in any way to prevent the passage of this or some other law, whatever law it may be, which in the judgment of this House shall tend in any manner to prevent the introduction or the spread of the ravages of those dreadful diseases which in the past have decimated and which may in the future decimate the people of this land. I think I speak the voice of the millions of the people of the North when I say that during the last year when our brethren in the Southern States were fleeing from their homes to avoid the pestilence which was sweeping them down by hundreds and by thousands, when we were called upon to contribute to their relief, to urge our physicians and nurses who were willing to go to assist them, when we were ready to pour out of our money and of our treasure whatever was necessary, more or less, to alleviate the situation, we were acting with that common humanity which belongs to us as a people and as a race, and we did cheerfully and joyfully whatever we might to alleviate the sufferings of our friends in the South.

Now, sir, when this act comes before Congress I for one do not feel, and I believe none of my friends on this side of the House have felt, disposed to raise one single point of order, to make one single objection, to hinder in any possible manner either the consideration or the passage of any bill which looked toward the relief desired; but, sir, while we do that we do not desire our friends of the South to stand in their places and pretend we are doing what we are not doing, pretend we are passing advisory resolutions here, pretend we are appropriating half a million of dollars of the money of the people of the United States merely in a gentle, advisory, assisting way, carrying on quarantine and sanitary regulations adopted by the States, with which we have nothing to do. Do not let us misunderstand each other. Either the people of the United States in their sovereign capacity in this Congress mean to assist in the prevention of the introduction of these scourges in the land by some law which shall be effective, forcible, carrying with it the strong arm of the Government of the United States to enforce its provisions, and paying out of the Treasury $500,000 to strengthen that arm of the Government to enforce its provisions, or they do not mean anything.

Sir, if the State-rights doctrine can prevent the exercise of the supreme power of Congress to defend its people, let those who advocate it and who bring State rights here to prevent our following the impulses of our natures—let them prevent the exercise of that power and let them answer to their constituents for doing so. But do not let them stand in their places and hope that we will not quibble, as the gentleman from Virginia says, on this subject of State rights and the supreme power of the nation. There is no quibbling; there shall be no quibbling. I will vote for this bill. I will vote to appropriate $500,000 out of the Treasury without even having it mentioned or intimated in the bill what that expense is for. I will not even inquire whether it is to pay for and keep up State sanitary regulations and State quarantines which the States claim to have the right solely to adopt and which they may possibly ask the Government to pay for.

But do not let us labor under a mistake. If this bill means anything it gives to officers of this Government power which is absolute, supreme, independent of State quarantine laws. If the States fail, if, as the bill says, they refuse to carry out the provisions of this law, then the General Government may act. If they refuse to pass the proper regulations, then this board of health shall report the matter to the head of this nation; not even to Congress. This board of health shall report to the supreme Executive of this nation and he shall make regulations. Without the aid of Congress even he shall make rules and regulations which shall bind the States and which shall be enforced. And this law provides that if the State authorities do not thus enforce and will not thus enforce the law, the President of the United States, like a supreme dictator, like a sultan on the throne, may send an officer who shall execute the law.

Do not deceive yourselves, gentlemen. Pass this bill and you pass the Rubicon. Pass this bill which the scourge of pestilence compels you to pass, for in no other way can you shut out this scourge from the land, and you have overstepped all your old finely drawn distinctions.

Sir, it does not do, as the gentleman from Virginia says, to leave the States within their borders along the shores at the distance of a marine league from land with the supreme control over this subject, and for the United States to go out on to the ocean a little beyond the line of State authority and establish a picket here and there out on the unknown waters over the unknown seas. You cannot in that way escape the dilemma in which you place yourselves by this law. The friends of State rights dare not make that question prominent when the lives of thousands of their fellow-citizens are quivering in the balance between the doctrine of State rights and the power of this great Government to fence out pestilence and disease and death from our midst.

The doctrine of State rights was asserted in connection with the internal improvements of the rivers and of the harbors of the United States ten years ago when I first became a member of the Committee on Commerce, and appropriation bills for rivers and harbors were before that committee and before this House. State-rights gentlemen of the South came in obedience to the demand of their constituents and urged the Committee on Commerce to make appropriations for harbors and rivers in their districts in the South. They said to the committee that they had been brought up to believe that the General Government had no right to make these appropriations; that it was a violation of the Constitution; that that was their theory, that that was their doctrine. In that they had been educated; there they would stand; but they asked the appropriation; they asked the Committee on Commerce to recommend an appropriation for their harbors and their rivers. We said to them, "if your people believe as you do that the State-rights doctrine is opposed to the appropriation of money for your harbors and for your rivers then we will not give them an appropriation; but if your people who have sent you here do not believe the doctrine which you advocate, we will remit the question to them and let them send some man here who does believe in appropriations." And it went to that extent, sir, that when the committee asked these southern State-rights men who demanded appropriations if they would vote for the bill with the appropriations they wanted and they said "no," the committee left out those works for which they demanded appropriations. Sir, it was the most effective solicitor for the nationality of this Government that I have ever known. [Laughter.] The gentle urgings of the constituents at home, the little petitions and suggestions sent up to the member to be sure and get an appropriation for his harbor and his river sapped the foundations of State rights in the mind of that immortal statesman, and he yielded the point and voted for the appropriation bill.

Now, although that was in olden times the test question of a State-rights man, the fundamental thing whether this Government had the right and the power to carry on within the States these internal improvements, I have looked round for the last two or three years with eager eyes to find a State-rights democrat of the South that did not come here and not only proclaim that the General Government had the right to make appropriations for the harbors and the rivers in his district, but who proclaimed that it ought to appropriate so far as their votes went all the money that was in the Treasury for that purpose; not appropriate by hundreds, not appropriate by thousands, not appropriate by hundreds of thousands, but by millions, and by nine millions at a time; $300,000 a year to the Big Kanawha, $250,000 a year to the Little Kanawha, $150,000 a year to the James River, $68,000 a year to the Appomattox. I cannot go on with the list.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How much to the Kiskiminetas?

Mr. CONGER. Show me a southern State-rights democrat on this floor for the last five years and I will show you the man whose conscience has been relieved from all obligation as a State-rights man if he had a harbor to build within his district, or a river to deepen and improve.

I am thankful, sir, for the honor of the American name that I can point out two, and I think three, southern State-rights men who have maintained their integrity till now, who voted against river and harbor bills, and denied the right of this Government to make the appropriations, and stood firmly by the State-rights doctrine towering head and shoulders, like Saul, above all the other Israelites in their adherence to the old State-rights doctrine. I have them in my eye now; but they have been compelled to cross that dividing line between the State-rights democracy and the gallant republicans on this side. One sits with us here to-day. [Laughter.] He has no rivers in his district.

There are one or two others whom I do not see present. I wish they were here, so that I might confer upon them that generous tribute which belongs to the few who have resisted all temptations and remained faithful to principle. The State-rights men of the North are drifting out into an unknown sea. Who will recall them back? My fog-horn is not sufficient. [Laughter.] Where will they find anchorage? To-day in this bill, in the interest of humanity and the protection of the lives of thousands, perhaps of hundreds of thousands of the people of this nation, it is gratifying to me to see our State-rights friends relinquishing the principle, driven by the dire necessity which pestilence and plague bring into the country, and rising in the strength of their humanity to stand by the Government, the National Government, in the performance of its duty to its people, notwithstanding their former devotion to State rights.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hail the passage of this bill with all that I may hope to be its valuable consequences to the American people as not only saving perhaps hundreds and thousands of the lives of our fellow-citizens, but also redeeming us by one more effort from that worse plague, that worse scourge, that worse pestilence of the American people, State-rights doctrine. [Applause on the republican side of the House.]

Mr. HOOKER. As a member of the committee appointed on epidemic diseases, I desire to say a single word in reference to this bill before the vote is taken. I have been somewhat surprised at the character of the discussion which has arisen on this bill. It was generally conceded when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] moved to create this committee in the House and the distinguished Senator from his State [Mr. HARRIS] moved to create a similar committee in the Senate that the power to do so was clearly derivable from that clause in the Constitution which gives Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States." I never heard it doubted; I never heard it debated; I never heard it questioned by any member of the House committee, nor do I know that the question was ever raised in the Senate committee, that under the power to regulate commerce between this country and foreign nations and to regulate interstate commerce that power did not remain on the part of the Federal Government to establish a national quarantine. It was suggested and suggested by members of all parties that when you want to establish a national quarantine the power resides in the Congress of the United States to do it. But prudence, wisdom, and experience have demonstrated the efficacy of State, municipal, and county quarantines, and that therefore the preservation of the national health by creating a national quarantine could not give rise to the discussion of the doctrine of State rights.

Nobody doubted, sir, that, under the provisions of the quarantine law which prevailed in the State of Texas, to which my friend, Judge REAGAN, has referred, great and efficient protection was found against the prevailing disease. In my own State, the State of Mississippi, in the city of Natchez, where the fever had invariably appeared when it prevailed in New Orleans, for the first time in the history of this terrible epidemic this city was free from this plague, owing alone to its strict municipal quarantine by land and water.

It is urged by the gentleman from Michigan and by others that because the committees of the two Houses of Congress, the committee that reported the bill and the committee of the Senate, propose to retain under the bill the State, county, and municipal quarantines which have thus proved so efficient throughout the land, we are suggesting the doctrine of State rights as opposed to the power of the Federal Government. Sir, it is a most terrible non sequitur that a logical mind ever attempted to impose on a deliberative body to say that if the power existed in Congress to establish a national quarantine we must in its exercise destroy and do away with all State, county, and municipal quarantines. We thought it could be established with great efficacy, especially with reference to the ports of South America with which we have such constant commercial intercourse. Because we have sought to preserve the State, municipal, and county quarantines it is suggested that we uphold doctrines of State rights as opposed to the power of the Federal Government, and the very fact that it comes here supported by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] and supported by the entire committee of the House so far as I am aware, shows that we did not intend in any manner in preserving the State, county, and municipal quarantines to question the power of the Federal Government to establish a national quarantine.

The necessity for this action arose from the terrible calamity which overspread this country last year, which taught us the lesson that while it is true that yellow fever is a tropical disease, is indigenous to tropical countries; that, in the language of Mr. Calhoun, "Vera Cruz is its native home" and from there it is imported into our ports—while we found this to be the case, the experience of last year demonstrated that it might go even as far North as the State of Ohio, and the experience of former years had demonstrated that it might go even to the port and city of New York.

All along the line of our Atlantic coast and all along the line of the Mississippi River we had State, county, and municipal quarantine regulations. Would any one opposed to this bill strike them down? Would any of us who favor the bill strike them down? What we say is that it would be wise legislation to create a great national quarantine which is intended not to overthrow the cordon of State quarantines, but to erect a barrier all around the entire continent, not only along the shores, but as far out into the ocean as the national jurisdiction extends. To do that, will any one say that we will strike down the State, county, and municipal quarantines which have already proved so efficient in many places?

I had occasion, Mr. Speaker, during the last session of Congress to say what I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read. It was then said that the sentiments which I expressed were intended to give rise to the idea that the establishment of a national quarantine would be the destruction of State quarantines, and therefore the destruction of the rights of the States over the question of health within their borders. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOOKER. I think the substitute which has just been read in the hearing of the House, offered by the majority of the House committee for the Senate bill, is not obnoxious to the criticism passed on it by the gentleman from Ohio. There is in this substitute no conflict between the authority of the United States and the powers to be exercised under it and the authority of the State. When we were taking this testimony in New Orleans, of the medical experts who spoke advisedly and intelligently on the origin and cause of the fever, the great bulk of them concurred in the opinion that this disease whenever it visited our country was imported. And when we took the testimony of commercial men on the question as to how the absolute shutting up of ports like New Orleans would affect their commerce, those engaged in the trade that would be especially affected by it, with South America, all concurred in the opinion that the question of interference with commerce was not to be considered, even in a money point of view, in comparison with the terrible losses which the prevalence of the epidemic always caused.

This evidence went to show that we could establish a national quarantine running all along the Atlantic coast against the ports from which this disease is usually brought; that we could establish a national quarantine, to be maintained by the Navy of the United States in a great degree, that should guard the outer lines of approach of these infectious diseases, while we would not interfere with the State or city regulations which were designed to protect the States or cities on the Atlantic coast. Would you establish a national quarantine, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, which would do away with the local quarantine? Would you establish under the bill as it comes from the Senate a national quarantine that would destroy the quarantine of New York and Boston and Charleston and Savannah and New Orleans? The very office and function of the House bill is that while we guard the national quarantine at the same time we preserve the quarantine which the States and cities on the Atlantic coast have provided for themselves.

Mr. HOOKER. It will be observed that in the sentiments which I expressed upon that occasion the question of State rights as connected with the power of the Federal Government over this subject was not named and not even suggested. It was a question as to whether or not the quarantine regulations which the State, counties, and municipal authorities had established should be maintained and preserved, not as in antagonism to a national quarantine, but as auxiliary to it and in support of it.

I say, therefore, that this bill is intended to preserve those regulations—not that we doubted the power of the Federal Government over this question; and therefore no man who votes for this bill now can be said to be in favor of striking down those regulations, and no man who refuses to vote for it can do so upon the ground that it is an invasion of the rights of the States. As we understand it, it is intended to operate within the sphere and power of the National Government.

The necessity for this action grew out of the terrible calamity which visited this country last year. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] pay the compliment to that people who responded so warmly and cordially to the wants and necessities of our people when they were visited with a plague as frightful as that which visited the great city of Argos, and which was described by that greatest of all tragedians of ancient or modern times, Sergeant Noon Talfourd. The picture which he drew of the terrors of that terrible scourge in the city of Argos was repeated again and again and again in many a city and town and hamlet, during the last terrible scourge that visited our country. In many a household all were stricken down. The fell destroyer spared neither decrepit age nor smiling infancy. The strong man of the household, writhing in his death agony, "striving, and not in vain, to cast a last parting smile on the fragile wife waning beside him; his limbs composed, the widow of a moment fixing her gaze of longing, speechless love on the babe, the only living thing which yet was hers, with wan and attenuated hand wave off the yet unstricken child, and so embraceless die, stifling the mighty hunger of the heart."

It was these pictures of terrible misery which suggested to the American people that it was necessary that a government supported by a common policy and a common patriotism and a common taxation of the entire people should come to the rescue in the calamity which was too great to be met by one single arm; that all forces should be united in order that we might give common protection to our common country.

I am glad that this appeal broke down sectional lines, that it struck down sectional ideas, that it struck down party notions, and made us realize the fact that we were all bone of the same bone, with kindred blood and a common lineage. I am glad that it called our Anglo-Saxon race everywhere all over this land to respond with that warmth of generosity which poured out the rich accumulated treasures and bestowed them upon the poor and stricken portion of the country that felt the great blow of this disease and this disaster; and I hope that that generous impulse of the northern people will find its palpable expression in the vote of this House in favor of the bill which the committee have had the honor to report.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I am willing now that a vote should be taken upon the amendments of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] I hope, however, he will withdraw them.

Mr. REAGAN. I prefer that my amendments should be voted on. I have no further remarks to make.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the general debate on this bill will be considered closed, and the bill will be proceeded with under the five-minute rule.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask permission of the House to call the previous question on the entire bill without discussing it by sections, which will consume a great deal of time. [Cries of "That is right."] I presume every member here has made up his mind how he will vote on the whole bill.

Mr. HOUSE. I hope the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his amendments and let the previous question be called, so that we may vote at once upon the entire bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the amendments are not yet pending.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I will call the previous question; and if it be voted down then the sense of the House can be taken on the amendments.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for three minutes.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, when a bill similar to this was before the House some time ago, I proposed, in order to save the local quarantine of New York from any Federal supervision or obstruction, a proviso to the effect that the rules, regulations, and laws of a local nature as then existing or as they might thereafter exist should not be interfered with. That amendment was accepted in deference to local authority, there being on this subject harmony of opinion. I see that in the third section of this bill, although we have not the same express language reserving the authority of our State and local quarantine regulations, there is an attempt to negative any superiority or predominancy of the Federal quarantine as administered by this National Board of Health over our State regulations and laws. I wish this reservation were more definitely expressed. Why, sir, I have a right to say that it has cost millions of money to the great State of New York to make her splendid quarantine regulations which in their careful administration have saved all the inland against these epidemics from the outland. Although our city is subject to the incursion of yellow fever, although from the middle of June to the middle of October we have this disease in our hospitals, yet by our system of local quarantine, by our hygienic precautions and other methods of prevention, we do prevent the yellow fever from entering our great metropolis and going into the interior by railroad communication. The same thing can be done at New Orleans. Dr. Vanderpoel, who is at the head of the quarantine system at New York, says:

Having listened to the detailed recital of the circumstances under which the disease was introduced at New Orleans, I do not hesitate to state that under similar circumstances yellow fever might be brought to the docks of New York any day during the four months of its prevalence in the harbor.

He says further that there is no time from the middle of June to the middle of October when this disease has not come constantly and extensively into the West Indies as well as our Atlantic and Gulf ports, particularly New York; so that except for local quarantine regulations the whole country, North as well as South, would be exposed to danger from the ravages of this disease.

Now, I desire to know whether men like Dr. Vanderpoel are satisfied with the provisions of this bill. I understand from my friend from Tennessee that Dr. Vanderpoel has seen this measure, that he approves it, and that he says it will not interfere with the local system of quarantine. Upon this statement of the gentleman from Tennessee I will give my vote for the bill, though I do so with reluctance. The argumentum ad misericordiam made so touchingly by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is capturing this House. It has captured my own heart. We cannot, even on the cynical appeal of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] refuse something to this great service in the cause of humanity. But, sir, I warn gentlemen, particularly those from the South, that by next December they will see the results of these measures; and if they do not meanwhile, in addition to this mere Federal bureaucracy, this distant supervision of the Board of Health, exercise local care and local supervision, all measures of this sort will be in vain, and the South will be desolated again as it was last year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If there are no further amendments, I will ask the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand that the agreement to have the bill considered by sections can be superseded in this way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the object of the gentleman in demanding the previous question.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If the previous question be voted down, the bill can then be considered by sections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote upon seconding the demand for the previous question can be regarded as testing the sense of the House.

Mr. CONGER. But an agreement of the House should not be lightly set aside in this way. The House agreed to consider the bill by sections as in Committee of the Whole, and I think the agreement should not thus be abrogated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point made by the gentleman from Michigan, if insisted upon, is undoubtedly correct, and the bill must be read by sections.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that was the understanding, I do not see how this House can take from members their right to offer amendments.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to make a suggestion in regard to the first section, and I say very frankly that I do it because I am in sympathy with the general purpose of the bill. There seems to me something wanting here.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the House understands there was an agreement that this bill should be considered by sections under the five-minute rule, I will interpose no objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the first section of the bill will be read.

Mr. BREWER. Before proceeding with the reading of the bill Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that it has not been printed, and the bill as it is on our desks is not the bill as it has come from the Senate and has been read in our hearing this morning. In order that the bill may be ordered to be printed and we may have it before us in print exactly as it is, I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee stated this morning that there were very immaterial alterations between the bill as printed and the bill as it lies on the Speaker's desk.

Mr. BREWER. I think the bill should be printed exactly as it comes to us from the Senate and that we should have it before us in print when we are called upon to vote on the several sections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan move that the House do now adjourn?

Mr. BREWER. I do; and I do so for the purpose of having the bill before us in print.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 65.

Mr. BREWER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any merchant ship or vessel from any foreign port where any contagious or infectious disease exists, to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health and all rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof; and any such vessel which shall enter, or attempt to enter, a port of the United States, in violation thereof, shall forfeit to the United States a sum, to be awarded in the discretion of the court, not exceeding $1,000, which shall be a lien upon said vessel, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States. And in all such proceedings the United States district attorney for such district shall appear on behalf of the United States, and all such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the rules and laws governing cases of seizure of vessels for violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to amend that section at the end of the seventh line by inserting the words "or established under the health laws of any State." And I will explain the reason for offering that amendment, and if I am wrong I will be happy to withdraw it. The bill provides that it shall be unlawful for a vessel to enter any port except in accordance with the provisions of this act (that is not material to what I am now about to say, but then it goes on to say) and all rules and regulations of State boards of health. Now, that does not go far enough to meet many of the provisions in many of the States; certainly in Massachusetts. Massachusetts has a State board of health, but it does not make rules and regulations governing the quarantine. The cities and towns of the State of Massachusetts have the quarantine regulations in charge; and in the port of Boston that is under the control of the city officers of Boston, and not the State board of health at all. Therefore while a ship might lawfully enter the port of Boston in obedience to the health regulations of that city, she might under this law be an offender because she did not enter in accordance with the rules and regulations of the State board of health. They are two separate organizations. Have I made myself plain?

Mr. McGOWAN. What are the words to be inserted?

Mr. ROBINSON. "Or established under the health laws of any State." That is, the rules and regulations established under the health laws of any State. That will cover the city and town regulations which are authorized to be made. There can be no possible objection to it. I dislike to offer the amendment as it necessitates the sending of the bill back to another branch, but I think it will be unwise to pass the bill without those words being inserted.

Mr. McGOWAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will if my five minutes have not expired.

Mr. McGOWAN. Allow me to refer to the bill. The first section provides that it shall be unlawful for any merchant ship or vessel to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and all rules and regulations of State boards of health or sanitary associations recognized by this act.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is stricken out by the act of the printed bill, and those latter words are not in the bill as it comes to us from the Senate.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. The whole difficulty with us is that we do not know exactly what is the language of the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is Senate bill 108 on the files of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the bill before the House has been changed from the bill as it is here in print.

Mr. McGOWAN. It was changed in that regard for the reason that there were many sanitary associations which adopted rules and regulations of their own and it was not proposed to subordinate these rules and regulations to mere temporary organizations under the State laws.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I wish to be heard before the vote is taken on that amendment. I should have no sort of objection to an amendment of that character under other circumstances, but it is so extremely improbable that it will give rise to any trouble in the direction the gentleman apprehends in its present form that I must object to it for the reason that any amendment to this bill will carry it back to the Senate, and when it goes back to the Senate again in my judgment that will be the loss of the bill at the present session of Congress. I am quite sure if my friend from Massachusetts believed that to be so he would not admit his amendment so important as to insist on it at the risk of defeating the bill.

I am justified by my colleague, the Senator from Tennessee, who had charge of this bill in the Senate, in saying that if we return it to the Senate at this late hour of the session the great divergence of opinion which exists among the members of that body in reference to various other provisions of the measure will work its certain defeat. For that reason I beg my friend from Massachusetts to withdraw his amendment. If harm should come from this at all it certainly cannot work any very hurtful results between now and next December, when other and additional legislation can be had on this subject. But for that reason I would accept the gentleman's amendment at once. But that being true, I ask the friends of the measure to consider now whether it is not better to let it go confessedly not entirely perfect than, in an effort to make it as nearly perfect as it can be made, bring about the defeat of the bill altogether. That is the alternative which in my judgment is submitted. And I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, if in his judgment he can do so without too great danger being incurred, to withdraw his amendment and let the bill pass as it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I for one moment believed that the offering of this amendment or the return of this bill to the Senate would afford the slightest ground for fearing that the Senate would not act upon this amendment and so enact the bill finally I would certainly withdraw it. But I cannot see how it should appear to any gentleman here that the Senate could refuse to act upon a little matter of this kind which I understood my friend from Tennessee to say is entirely right and ought to be in the bill, and which meets the case I have stated and meets it squarely. The Senate, if I read the RECORD rightly, passed this bill by a very decided majority. I cannot assume that it will not pass upon this amendment. I cannot assume that another branch of this Government which has already passed upon this measure by its vote does not recognize its importance as much as we do.

I certainly wish it to be understood I do not offer this in any spirit of hostility to the bill. But can it be that between this time and the date when I hope we shall pass some appropriation bills and be ready to go home the Senate of the United States will not have time and will not be willing to pass on this amendment?

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHALMERS. Does the gentleman not think that the term "State boards of health" would include city boards?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it would not.

Mr. CHALMERS. Would it not include all boards organized by State law?

Mr. ROBINSON. In Massachusetts we have an organization known as the State board of health. Then in the different municipalities we have city and town boards of health.

Mr. CHALMERS. The language is "State boards;" and any board organized by State law would be a State board.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would understand the expression to mean boards of the different States.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I do not know if I made myself clearly understood. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts labors under some misapprehension as to what I intended to convey. I did not mean to say that if the bill went back to the Senate with the amendment the gentleman proposes the Senate would for that reason decline to act upon it. I meant to convey this meaning, that if it went back there another discussion would follow, protracted perhaps through a number of days. It might come back here with other amendments. Another discussion would follow here. The period is approaching, as the gentleman suggests—it will certainly come some time in the future—when this session must adjourn. That period cannot be very far off. And between the two Houses trying to arrive at an agreement about the amendments offered by one and the other, the danger is that Congress will adjourn without taking final action at all. And there is another view also to be taken of it. The time is now at hand when if we are to expect any practical results from the operation of this bill it must be put in force. The warm weather is upon us now.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Is the gentleman from Tennessee willing to adjourn Congress without passing the appropriations?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. No, sir; I am not. I answer your question very frankly. I think the appropriation bills should pass and Congress should be ready to adjourn very soon. But leaving that out of view, for the reasons I have explained there is great danger that this bill may fail if any amendment be now put upon it, and even if it does not fail eventually the time will pass when it will be of any practical benefit for the present season. It ought to be in operation this very day, this very hour; for every hour that its passage is delayed increases the danger we may have to face this summer. For that reason I hope the amendment will be voted down if my friend from Massachusetts insists upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I may withdraw that amendment; but before doing so I want to make a statement in connection with it, because I think it possible the House may see the necessity of amending the bill in another place. If we have to amend the bill in another particular, I am willing to withdraw this amendment for the present that I may renew it hereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to return to this section?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; the other amendment to which I refer is to the same section.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. We had better vote, then, on the gentleman's amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. ROBINSON'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. When the gentleman from Tennessee called for a vote on my amendment I was about to withdraw it. But I wish to call the attention of the House to a difference between provisions of the first and the second sections. One provides a penalty of $1,000 for any violation of the provisions of the act; and then there is a penalty of $500 for violating a single feature of the act.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That is an apparent inconsistency of the bill. I had observed it myself. But I do not think it will have any practical operation to any extent. I would not have attached so great a penalty to the one section, and I would have lessened the penalty in the other section, but I do not apprehend that there will be any abuse arising out of that in the short time which must elapse between now and the next session of Congress.

The first section was then agreed to.

The Clerk read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. All such vessels shall be required to obtain from the consul, vice-consul, or other consular officer of the United States at the port of departure, or from the medical officer, where such officer has been detailed by the President for that purpose, a certificate in duplicate setting forth the sanitary history of said vessel, and that it has in all respects complied with the rules and regulations in such cases prescribed for securing the best sanitary condition of the said vessel, its cargo, passengers, and crew; and said consular or medical officer is required, before granting such certificate, to be satisfied the matters and things therein stated are true; and for his services in that behalf he shall be entitled to demand and receive such fees as shall by lawful regulation be allowed, to be accounted for as is required in other cases.

That upon the request of the National Board of Health the President is authorized to detail a medical officer to serve in the office of the consul at any foreign port for the purpose of making the inspection and giving the certificates hereinbefore mentioned: Provided, That the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed at any one time six: Provided further, That any vessel sailing from any such port without such certificate of said medical officer, entering any port of the United States, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500, which shall be a lien on the same, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States. And in all such proceedings the United States district attorney for such district shall appear on behalf of the United States, and all such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the rules and laws governing cases of seizure of vessels for violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend by inserting after the word "detailed," in the fourth, seventeenth, and twenty-first lines of the first section, the words "or assigned."

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I am opposed to that amendment, as I am to all amendments to this bill.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. To test the sense of the House I call the previous question on the entire bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House by unanimous consent ordered that this bill be considered by sections.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I know that; but the House may now change that order.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was asked in the following cases:

To Mr. VALENTINE, for three days, on account of the severe illness of his wife;

To Mr. PIERCE, indefinitely, on account of sickness;

To Mr. LOWE, indefinitely, on account of sickness;

To Mr. MONEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness;

To Mr. MCCOOK, for five days;

To Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, for three days, on account of important business;

To Mr. MORSE, indefinitely, on account of important business;

To Mr. GARFIELD, for three days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. THOMAS TURNER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

Mr. REAGAN. I object to the granting of further leaves of absence to gentlemen, or we shall be left without a quorum. I object to granting leave of absence to any member except upon his own sickness or sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the gentlemen to whom leave of absence has been granted have probably already left the city.

Mr. REAGAN. I object to giving leave of absence in any case, unless the member be called away by sickness in his family

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will then suggest that leave of absence be considered as granted only in those cases where sickness has been assigned as the reason for asking the leave.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the adjustment of certain newspaper accounts for advertising the sale of Kansas Indian lands in 1874 and 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FINES ON THE POST-OFFICE CONTRACTORS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in accordance with section 413 of the Revised Statutes, reports of the fines imposed on and the deductions from the pay of contractors made during the fiscal years ending 1876 and 1878; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. HAYES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EVANS'S COMPILATION OF IMPORTS.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following report; which was read:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of May 20, 1879, instructing the committee "to inquire into and report as to the propriety of procuring for the use of Congress a compilation of the imports into the United States and the rate of duties thereon, which has been prepared by Charles H. Evans, in the Bureau of Statistics," having had the same under consideration respectfully report it back to the Senate, and recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed the usual number of "a compilation of the imports into the United States and the rates of duties thereon," prepared by Charles H. Evans for the use of Congress.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Does the compilation include the imports merely, or the exports as well?

Mr. BECK. It is a compilation of the last twelve years, embracing all the imports into the United States, the consumption, the rate of duty ad valorem, and everything relating to commerce and navigation. There are twelve volumes to be printed in one book under appropriate heads. We think it is extremely valuable, but we desire the Committee on Printing to look at it first.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is the compilation already printed?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; it is already prepared and in writing, made up by a man employed for years in the Bureau of Statistics, a very competent man; but we should like the Committee on Printing to look at it before the subject is finally acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ELECTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN RHODE ISLAND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further routine morning business, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolutions offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] yesterday.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. MCDONALD:

Resolved, That so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene and the accompanying petition of Augustus Woodbury and other honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States and citizens of the State of Rhode Island as relates to the alleged violation of sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the appointment of wounded soldiers and sailors to civil offices, and also so much of said memorial as relates to alleged violations of civil-service reform in the State of Rhode Island, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, with authority to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene as relates to the interference of Federal officers in the election in Rhode Island and to the denial of the right to vote to any citizens of the United States who are also citizens of the State of Rhode Island, and also the alleged frauds or undue influence practiced against citizens of said State at the late election, be referred to the select committee to inquire into alleged frauds in the late elections, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its courtesy in declining to consider yesterday a memorial presented to the Senate in my absence, and which contained an offensive mention of my name. The memorial and the papers were made public in the newspapers before they were brought to the attention of the Senate. They contain as little truth as sense, and as little sense as syntax. They were gotten up by a disappointed politician, actuated by personal malevolence toward me, for some fancied slight, of which I knew nothing, in a newspaper with which I am connected, and by a vindictiveness toward the collector of the port of Providence, who had removed his brother from a subordinate position in the custom-house. That brother was a soldier. He served in California, and I think did not, during the whole war, see the face of a rebel. His successor was a soldier who entered the Army in the Ellsworth Zouaves, and fought through the whole contest, and was severely wounded at Port Hudson.

The term of office of the collector of the port of Providence, after a service of eight years, being about to expire, it was the pleasure of the President to send to the Senate the nomination of a new man. It was the pleasure of the Senate to confirm him. He had the misfortune to be my kinsman. As I was not instrumental in originally bringing his name to the attention of the appointing power, I did not feel it necessary to oppose him on that ground, as I knew that he was otherwise qualified.

The new collector has made but few removals in the custom-house, I think but three or four. I was not consulted, nor was my colleague, I believe, in any of these cases. I scarcely know the officers removed or those appointed; some I do not even know by sight. It has never been my habit to interfere in the appointment of the subordinate officers in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, preferring to leave their selection to the heads of Departments who are responsible for their conduct. I remember but one single interference that I ever made, and that was some years ago, when a very worthy officer was removed without cause and I interposed for his restoration, which was granted.

This proposed investigation involves an inquiry into the right of the President to make the nomination, the right of the Senate to confirm it, and the right of the collector of the port of Providence to make the appointments of officers vested in him by law, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. If any committee of the Senate desires to occupy itself with such an investigation, I have no disposition to interfere with the innocent amusement.

The second resolution, as I read it in the RECORD, makes reference to the denial of suffrage in Rhode Island to certain persons who are citizens of that State and of the United States. I did not notice anything of this in the hasty perusal which I gave to the petition, but I presume it is there. Some denials of the right of suffrage to citizens of this class are made in every State. The institutions of Rhode Island, and especially its restricted suffrage, have been the subject of much animadversion by persons outside of its limits, and the cause of frequent complaint by those who have no legitimate concern in them. They are eminently satisfactory to those who ordained them, who have sustained them, who live under them, and who enjoy all their advantages, and suffer all their inconveniences. Repeated attempts have been made to modify them, which have uniformly failed, and some of the heaviest majorities against the proposed modification have been given in the strongest democratic districts in the State.

Rhode Island is a State in the Union, independent in all things, except those which she has delegated to the Federal Government. She claims the right to make her own fundamental laws, to enact her own legislation, always in obedience to the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted in pursuance thereof. She makes no intrusive and impertinent interference in the affairs of other States, and she tolerates none in her own.

This subject was brought to the attention of the Senate as long ago as 1870, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which you, Mr. President, were a member. That committee made a report upon the subject, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

May 26, 1870, Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Rhode Island setting forth, by reference, the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and stating that "the State of Rhode Island, notwithstanding the provisions of the above-named amendments, persists in and by the first section of article 2 of the constitution of said State, in denying and abridging the right of about ten thousand citizens of the United States to vote at any and all elections holden in said State," and praying that Congress will "pass such appropriate legislation as may be found necessary to obtain for, and secure to, the citizens of the United States resident in Rhode Island all the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States," respectfully report:

That the constitution of Rhode Island, adopted in 1842, prescribes two alternative classes of qualifications for voting. The first gives to all male citizens of the United States of a certain age, &c., the right to vote, if they own real estate of the value of $134, or which shall rent for $7 per annum. The second gives to every male native citizen of the United States of a certain age, &c., the right to vote, if he pays a tax of $1 a year, &c., although he may not own real estate. No man or party has ever questioned the right of the people of Rhode Island, and of every other State, to establish such a constitution of government as may be agreeable to their views of the public welfare in that State, although its provisions as to suffrage may not conform to the opinions of citizens of other States. At the time when this constitution of Rhode Island was adopted the right to regulate the qualifications of voters belonged exclusively to the respective States. The petition under consideration fully recognizes this, but it raises the question (although studiously framed in such a manner as not to declare or insist upon such a conclusion) whether, by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, natives of foreign countries who have become citizens of the United States are not entitled to vote in Rhode Island, without regard to the qualifications imposed by her constitution?

The committee is unanimously of the opinion that this question must be answered in the negative.

The "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States," mentioned in the petition as secured by the fourteenth amendment, do not include the right of suffrage. If they did, the right must necessarily exist in all citizens of the United States, from the mere fact of citizenship, without the power in any State or in Congress to abridge the same in any degree; and in such case, therefore, no qualification of any kind could be imposed, and all persons, (being citizens,) males and females, infants, lunatics, and criminals, without respect to age, length of residence, or any other thing, would be entitled to participate directly in all elections. Every provision in every State, which experience has proved to be essential to security and good order in society, would thereby be overthrown. It is enough to say that the rights secured by this amendment to the Constitution are of an altogether different character.

The fifteenth amendment does apply to rights of suffrage, and to those only. By it the State of Rhode Island, in common with every other State, is forbidden to deny or abridge the right of citizens of the United States "to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." But, plainly, the constitution of Rhode Island does not preclude any citizen from voting on either or any of the grounds thus prohibited. No fact of race or color or previous servitude prevents any citizen from voting in Rhode Island. Neither of these qualities depends in any degree upon the place of his nativity. This seems too obvious to need discussion. It is also a fact, appearing in the public records of Congress and doubtless known to the petitioners, that when the fifteenth amendment was under consideration by Congress it was proposed to embrace in it a prohibition of any denial of suffrage on account of "nativity," and that this proposition was not agreed to, for the reason that Congress did not think it expedient to restrict the ancient powers of the States in these respects any further than appeared to be absolutely needful to secure to the whole people the great results of the overthrow of the rebellion.

The committee is therefore of opinion that there is nothing in the provisions of the constitution of Rhode Island referred to in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Whether these provisions are wise or right in themselves is a matter over which neither the committee nor Congress has any control. That subject belongs to the people of Rhode Island, who, it must be presumed, will correct any and all errors that may from time to time be found to exist in her internal affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I will read the names of the Committee on the Judiciary at the time that report was made to show the weight of legal authority upon which it was based: Mr. Trumbull of Illinois, Mr. Stewart of Nevada, Mr. EDMUNDS of Vermont, Mr. CONKLING of New York, Mr. Rice of Arkansas, Mr. CARPENTER of Wisconsin, and Mr. THURMAN of Ohio. Upon that authority I am willing to rest.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] has thanked the Senate for its courtesy in not considering these resolutions yesterday, the day on which they were presented. I think the Senator from Rhode Island has been informed that it was not the purpose of the mover of the resolutions to have them considered yesterday, or in his absence. I know that his colleague was so informed before these resolutions were introduced.

I will state the simple story of how the petition and memorial came to be introduced by me. A citizen of Rhode Island, and a very reputable citizen of that State now, who was for many years a citizen of my own State and honored in that State, gave the gentleman who brought the memorial and petition to Washington City a letter of introduction to me, and accredited him as a gentleman entitled to respect. Upon his arrival he presented his letter of introduction and stated generally the purpose of his visit to Washington, and requested that if it should become necessary to present these papers to Congress I should take charge of their presentation, which I promised him to do. He was seeking some other modes of redress, in which he did not desire or seek any aid or assistance from me. Yesterday morning he called to say that he was ready to have the petition presented to Congress with his memorial accompanying it, and desired that the investigation which these resolutions suggest should be made. I intended to call upon the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] before presenting them, but he, having heard that these papers were in my possession, called at my committee-room before the session of the Senate yesterday. I then exhibited them to him, and told him how they came into my possession, what my purposes were in regard to them, and that I had no desire or design that they should be considered until the Senators from that State were ready for their consideration. Now, I think the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] knew all that.

As to the subject of this investigation, Mr. President, I have nothing to say except what is presented on the face of these papers. It will be time enough, if this investigation is made, to consider, upon the facts that shall be returned by the committee, what ought to be the action of this body.

But a word as to the second resolution. We have heard a good deal said during the course of this extra session about the interest that each State had in the congressional representation of other States, that the Federal Government and the Federal power and all that class of questions gave to the people of each State some right to inquire into the condition of representation in every other State; and it may be a subject of very important inquiry to know whether our sister State of Rhode Island that casts less than twenty-four thousand votes, with two members of Congress, is entitled under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution to that representation. No one denies that she has the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters within her limits, voters of the State, so that she does not deny the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition; but the fourteenth amendment goes further than that, and it expressly provides that where the right to vote of any citizen of the United States, whether born in a foreign country or born in the United States, if he is a citizen of the United States, is curtailed for any other cause than that of being concerned in rebellion, then the State shall be proportionately curtailed of its representation in Congress. The average popular vote of congressional districts under the present apportionment is about thirty-four thousand.

Mr. BLAINE. In the average of districts throughout the United States?

Mr. McDONALD. It is the average in Indiana; it is the average in most of the States; but the State of Rhode Island holds two Representatives in the other branch of this Congress with less than twenty-four thousand votes. A class of citizens that happened, it is true, to be born in a foreign country are not permitted to vote there unless they own real estate. A real-estate property qualification in so small a State as Rhode Island, where they have not land enough to go round, is a pretty severe provision. It is the last State in the Union that should maintain a property qualification against citizens of the United States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the resolutions I have offered in reference to these papers make a proper disposition of them at this time; and in the second resolution there is something more than the question of whether the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution has been complied with in that State. The question is presented there of fraud in the elections, of fraudulent influence and interference by Federal officers with the elections; and if other States are to be investigated is there any reason why Rhode Island should not be also?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I disclaim any intention of imputing a discourtesy to my friend from Indiana in introducing these papers; in fact, he stated, as I see in the RECORD, that he did not intend to press the matter in my absence, and in my thanks to the Senate for their courtesy I should have especially included him, which I now do.

The State of Rhode Island, Mr. President, is one of the old thirteen. She is not indebted to any of her larger sisters for the rights and privileges which she enjoys in this Union. She helped to make this Union; she helped to fight the war of Independence, and she contributed the second general of that war to the continental army; and since that she has maintained her full share of the public renown in arms and in arts, on the land and on the sea and on the lake. Where would the State of Indiana be if Rhode Island and Delaware and New Hampshire and Connecticut had not breathed the breath of life into her nostrils? Where would my friend from Indiana be? A Delegate from the Northwest Territory in the other House of Congress, with a right to speak and not a right to vote.

Mr. President, the provision of the fourteenth amendment restricting the representation of a State in proportion to the restriction of the suffrage is valid, and is observed in assigning the representation of Rhode Island; our representative ratio is computed, taking into consideration that restriction. We have two Senators in this body, of which we cannot be deprived without our own consent, and we have the one Representative in the House of Representatives to which every

State is entitled, and we have the other by virtue of one of the larger fractions. We have only what the Constitution and the law allow us. This we mean to hold.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana refers to some interviews with this memorialist, Dr. Greene, in which he stated that he, Greene, was not yet ready to have the memorial presented, and that matters were transpiring which might prevent the necessity of its presentation. Now, it is only proper that I should state what I think were the reasons for the delay.

As I said yesterday, Dr. Greene showed me the petition of the soldiers and I offered to present it. He said to me that he wanted none of these papers presented until he had ascertained whether justice could not be had. I told him that I knew of the discharge of Captain Greene, although I did not know at the time that he was his brother; and that at the request of an eminent citizen of Rhode Island my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] and I were trying to secure him another position under the Government. He then said to me that if that could be done nothing more would be done with his memorial. I at once ceased my efforts in behalf of his brother, because I did not choose to be a party to any such bargain, and my colleague, to whom I related what had occurred, agreed with me in this course.

The memorialist sent me a letter under date of 12th instant, but which only reached me the day before yesterday, in which he said in substance that if the wrong done to his brother could be remedied there would be no further agitation of the subject by him. No answer was sent to that letter. The consequence was that he went to the honorable Senator from Indiana, and, as the Senator says, told him he was now ready, and so the memorial and the petition of soldiers, which referred in no way to the memorial, were presented. The Senator from Indiana asks the Senate to consider the memorial of one disappointed man, and asks the adoption of a resolution to authorize an important committee of this Senate, on the representation of this one man who has been here for several weeks trying to get an office for his brother, to go to Rhode Island to investigate the elections which took place there last year and the year before and possibly the year before that. We have no objection, as I said yesterday, to having this committee in Rhode Island. We should be very glad to have them there, and we know exactly what sort of a report they will have to make after they have investigated us; but we think the course of the Senator from Indiana in presenting this memorial is not respectful to the delegation from the State of Rhode Island or to the State.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Indiana, was not the original resolution constituting what was once called the Teller committee and is now called the Wallace committee, broad enough to cover an investigation into the elections in Rhode Island?

Mr. McDONALD. I think not.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think it is not confined to any State at all. It covers the whole United States.

Mr. McDONALD. It can do no harm to call the attention of the committee to this.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It may do no harm; but I wished to bring the matter prominently out, that unless I am mistaken there was no occasion for this special resolution, as the original resolution covers I think every State in the United States.

Mr. McDONALD. As to mere frauds in elections, that probably would be so; but this inquiry goes further than that, and is as to whether a provision of the Constitution is not so interfered with as to require a restriction of representation.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not wish to take any special part in the matter really at issue here; and I should not say a word but for a remark that fell from the honorable Senator from Indiana stating that the average basis of representation in this country showed 34,000 votes to a district and questioning Rhode Island's right to have two members in the other House because she threw 24,000 votes only. I hold in my hand a statement showing that in the State of Georgia in the third district there were only 2,628 votes cast at the last congressional election; in the sixth district only 3,192 votes thrown. There are two districts that altogether poll less than 6,000 votes. Then take Mississippi. In Mississippi the fourth district threw only 4,650 votes; the fifth district threw only a little over 5,000 votes, and the sixth district threw 6,000 votes. There are three districts in Mississippi that threw only about half as many votes as the two districts in Rhode Island. Over here in Virginia the fifth district threw 5,700 against 4,000, making 9,700 in all for that one district. The fifth district threw 12,000 votes, the sixth district 11,000, the seventh district 11,000, the eighth district 7,000, and the ninth district about 9,000.

The honorable Senator from Indiana must have gauged the whole United States by the populous and increasing district in which he himself lives, where the great city of Indianapolis gives such an overwhelming vote. But he is very far wide of the mark when he puts 34,000 or 35,000 votes as the average. There is not another district in his own State that goes up to 30,000, I believe; and when Rhode Island comes to be disfranchised because she cannot show over 12,000 votes to a district, you will have to spread the disfranchisement much wider and take in a great many States that send Representatives to Congress on half the vote that she sends them on.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I will simply say, as the Senator from Maine is very fond of referring to matters that he knows very little about, that the second district of Georgia—how it gets into the Directory as it does I do not know—polled I think 15,000 votes. Why they put it in the Congressional Directory that Mr. COOK received 2,628 votes I do not know.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the third district, not the second.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am speaking of the third district. Mr. COOK was the candidate in the third district. The Congressional Directory says he received "2,628 votes without opposition." There was no opposition to his election at all, as I understand; and there was no other election in the State except the congressional election, and so very few people voted. It very frequently happens that when there is but one election pending, whether it be for a State officer or a congressional candidate, and there is no opposition, there is a very slight vote polled, though I think there must be a typographical error even as to that.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator will observe the typographical mistake must have applied to two or three other districts. Take the sixth district. There were only 3,192 votes in the entire district.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The sixth district is in exactly the same condition. There was no opposition.

Mr. BLAINE. What was the reason of the fact that there was no opposition?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Because there was nobody a candidate but the man who was elected.

Mr. BLAINE. That was all?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is the only reason I know.

Mr. BLAINE. There was such a rushing unanimity then, that, accepting the figures of the Senator from Indiana that there were 34,000 or 35,000 votes in each of those districts, only about 2,600 cared to come out.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I suppose so. I think there is no law to compel them to come out.

Mr. BLAINE. There is a law, however, which allows them to come out.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Oh, yes, and I suppose nobody prevents their coming out. The Senator from Maine is always discovering something wonderful.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. The Senator from Maine was only discovering some figures, and he was replying to the Senator from Indiana, who had discovered that the average representative basis in this country was thirty-four thousand, or thirty-five thousand voters to a district, a fact which the Senator from Maine has discovered that the official records of Congress do not carry out.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Maine has a facility for taking up districts in which there was no opposition when the vote does not turn out, and reading that as though that was the voting population of the district.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well, then, if the Senator from Georgia will permit——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know which has it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BLAINE. Which does the Chair decide is entitled to the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It will always require a struggle to keep the floor from the Senator from Maine.

Now, I have to say that according to my recollection of the facts the districts in Georgia average about 25,000 votes. It is not often that they poll the whole vote. It so happens in Georgia that the people are very unanimous on one side it is true, and frequently there is no opposition except in the nominating convention; and at the last election especially, when there was no other election held in the State according to my recollection except of members of Congress, in some of the districts there was very little interest felt. But in a few of the districts there was interest taken, there were different candidates, there were canvassers, and the people were brought out. Take, for instance, the seventh district; the seventh district was a hotly contested district between a regularly nominated democrat and an independent.

Mr. CONKLING. He was a democrat, too, was he not?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir; though they called him a republican in some of the papers—Dr. FELTON of the House, a very excellent gentleman and a democrat. The contest was simply between two men, both democrats, and the people took a great interest in the election and it brought out a pretty full vote.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope my friend will not resent my wish to guard him against a misapprehension of supposing that you can make a republican by calling him a republican. Oh no! a man must be a republican to be so.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. CONKLING. I was afraid the Senator was falling into an error on that point.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The independent democrat from the seventh district of Georgia is a democrat, and a most excellent democrat at that—unquestionably a democrat, and a very strong and reliable democrat. In the seventh district, where this contest was held, the vote was this: the independent democrat received 14,315 votes against 12,965 votes for the regular democrat, showing over 27,000 votes polled in that district—more than the whole voting population of Rhode Island. That is one district.

The ninth district was also a hotly contested district. There was a regular democrat and also an independent democrat running; no republican, I will say to my friend from New York; both candidates were out and out democrats unquestionably. There the independent democrat received 10,900 votes against 10,675 votes for the nominee of the party, making over 21,000 votes—nearly 22,000 votes in that one district.

My impression is that the districts in Georgia are very equally divided as to population. That is the object in laying off the districts, I know, to have them as nearly as possible of equal population; and wherever the votes are called out, the voting population ranges from twenty to twenty-seven thousand. I incline to think the seventh district is perhaps the heaviest voting district in the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the population of Georgia by the last census?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The population of Georgia by the last census I think is nearly a million and a quarter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would make about one-tenth voters.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. She has nine Representatives according to the ratio of representation. There was also quite a warm contest in the fourth district. The Senator from Maine read the vote in the third district, where Mr. COOK, who was the only candidate, having no opposition, received a very small vote, less than 3,000. In the fourth district, immediately adjoining the third, just above it—and I am rather inclined to think that this district has not more population than the third—there were two candidates, both democrats and both independent; that is, neither was regularly nominated. There was no nomination in the district; and therefore there were two democratic candidates neither of them nominated, and the contest was quite warm. There was a canvass of the district and the voters were very well brought out.

Mr. BLAINE. When two democrats were running.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly; nobody else runs in Georgia.

Mr. BLAINE. There seems to be occasionally a district that permits a republican to run. There is the second. There seems to be permission for a republican to run in the second district. Did the Senator see that?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It is a very astonishing thing to the Senator from Maine that a man should not run for office.

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad to get the admission of the Senator from Georgia that nobody runs for office in that State but democrats.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now, you are welcome to it.

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad of that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am glad to gratify you. I am glad you are so easily satisfied. Nobody prevents them from running. Everybody can run who wants to do so. There is no law against it, no rule against it, no custom against it. Even the Senator from Massachusetts could go down there and run for an office if he wanted to, and nobody will object to the Senator from Maine taking a run down there.

In the fourth district which immediately adjoins the third, where there was a canvass, Mr. PERSONS, who was elected as a democrat, received 13,336 votes against 10,101 votes for Mr. Harris, a democrat also; showing nearly 24,000 votes in the fourth district. That is the case throughout.

Now for Mr. STEPHENS'S district, one of the largest districts in the State, but he received I believe only 3,355 votes against 58 scattering votes. Why? Because there was no opposition; that was all. In the fifth district, being the district in which I live, there were also two candidates, and there the contest was somewhat animated. There was a regular nominee, and there was also an independent, both democrats. The nominee received 10,269 votes against 8,186 votes for Mr. Arnold. There less than 20,000 votes were polled. In some of these districts where the race is between two democrats, and only two democrats, a great many republicans take very little interest and do not care to vote. But in other districts, as in the seventh, for instance, and in the ninth, the republicans vote and vote very cheerfully and earnestly. They take sides in the contest between the democrats, and that brings out the full vote. I think there were a good number of republicans in the fifth district, the district in which I live and where Atlanta is located, who did not take much interest in it.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand, then, from the honorable Senator from Georgia, that a republican is allowed to take his choice between democrats that are running.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is wonderful; but if you want information, I will say that is so. Judging from the specimens you have given us heretofore, you need a great deal more information. But it is true, astonishing as it may seem to the brilliant intellect of the Senator from Maine, that a republican is allowed to choose between democrats in Georgia—a happy condition of things. I do not know whether that is allowed in Maine or not.

All this has nothing to do with any question that I know of before the Senate. I merely state these facts to show that the general average in Georgia in the congressional districts ranges from twenty to twenty-seven thousand votes polled.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the whole vote of Georgia?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The whole vote of Georgia, I think, when fully polled is about 180,000. That is my recollection. When there is a full vote, I think the whole vote of Georgia would be about 180,000.

Mr. TELLER. How many Representatives?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Nine.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is 20,000 votes to a Representative.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. There may be more. I do not pretend to state it accurately; I may be mistaken. There may be over two hundred thousand. I only know that the voting in the districts averages from twenty to twenty-seven thousand votes, and of course that multiplied by nine would make over one hundred and eighty thousand. I may be mistaken in the fact, but my recollection is that the largest vote I have known polled recently amounted to about one hundred and eighty thousand.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to state in this connection the fact that my State, which has seventy-five thousand voters, or nearly that, has but one Representative.

Mr. MCDONALD. Mr. President, in referring to the popular vote of Rhode Island I had in my mind the highest vote cast by that State, and that I think was at the last presidential election, and that, if my memory is not at fault, was twenty-four thousand. In speaking of the congressional ratio I had in my mind, as a matter of course, more particularly my own State than any other, for I knew more about it. At the last session of the Legislature the State was redistricted for congressional purposes, and as we take there the census of the qualified voters as the basis of our State apportionment, it was also looked to in determining the congressional apportionment, and I know that the average there was from thirty-two thousand to thirty-four thousand voters in a district.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that the census in Indiana is a census of qualified voters, and not of inhabitants?

Mr. MCDONALD. No, sir. I said this: that in our State apportionment we base it for legislative purposes upon our popular vote, upon the qualified voters, which work was performed at the last session of the Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that by the State constitution?

Mr. MCDONALD. By the constitution of the State. At the same time, however, there was a bill passed redistricting the State for congressional purposes; and in the formation of those districts, while as a matter of course we did not increase or decrease our congressional representation, the popular vote of our State was consulted with a view of determining the size of the congressional districts; we were trying to get them as near right as possible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator a map of the new districts in the State?

Mr. MCDONALD. I have of the old.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be an interesting thing to see that new map.

Mr. CONKLING. No man has been able to make such a map, I understand.

Mr. MCDONALD. I have a map of the old districts that is at the disposal of the Senator from Vermont at any time, and as soon as I can get a map of the new districts he can put them side by side. I am very willing to see them there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 4.

EXCHANGE OF SUBSIDIARY COINS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, in section 3, line 3, to strike out "twenty" an insert "ten;" so as to make the section read:

> That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coins shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10 in full payment of all dues, public and private.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment proposed by the committee by striking out the word "ten" and inserting the word "five."

Mr. TELLER. Why not strike out the whole section and leave the statute as it is?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know that would be the effect; but I cannot move that now. My amendment will make the legal-tender extent of subsidiary coin just what it is by law now, which is the point on which I wish to take the sense of the Senate. If, as this bill provides, there is to be a redemption or exchange of these subsidiary coins for lawful money, and, then as the second section provides, an exchange of lawful money for subsidiary coins, making it reciprocal, deposit and issue on demand of anybody at any time, there is no occasion for running up this legal-tender quality above what it is now, and in my belief it is injurious to the laboring classes of community, many of whom work by the week. A large proportion of the laborers in this country now work by the week, contract for a week's wages that are paid every Saturday night; and they earn more than $5 but usually less than $10. The consequence will be to force upon them this subsidiary and inconvenient coin. The object of this bill being to get rid of the evils of the present condition of that coinage, I hope the Senate will agree with me in putting this "ten" down to "five," just where it is now, and for the reason I have stated.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I perhaps should be disposed to concur with the Senator from Vermont in fixing the amount of the legal tender at $5, which is the present amount fixed by law and the amount that has always been fixed by the laws of the United States for the legal-tender limit of subsidiary coin. But the Senate are aware that the other branch of Congress fixed the amount at $20, which I consider excessive; and it was the opinion of the committee that under existing circumstances perhaps there was no objection to increasing the legal-tender limit of subsidiary coin to the amount which the English government have for the past sixty years allowed their own subsidiary silver coin, debased rather more than ours, to be taken as a tender. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the Committee on Finance will be sustained by the Senate, and that $10 will be allowed as the limit hereafter for the legal tender of subsidiary coin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out "ten" and insert "five" in lieu of it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the committee to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope this amendment proposed by the committee will not prevail. I think the bill should be left as it came from the House in this respect, instead of being reduced from "twenty" to "ten." It should either remain at "twenty" or be increased.

Mr. BAYARD and Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. This is the amendment of the committee, I understand?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this question was very carefully considered by the committee; and it has been the subject of too much debate for me now to detain the Senate upon it; but it is very obvious that subsidiary coin debased by the Government, issued as token coinage for the convenience of its people, must have a fixed and just limitation of its legal-tender power. This is not at all a question of preference or equality between the two great metals; it is no question of conflict between gold and silver; it is simply a question of the convenience of the country in regard to its subsidiary coinage. It is debased below the standard value; it is declared to be so; it is issued simply for the purpose of the convenience of the people in their minor dealings; and surely there is a reasonable experience of mankind on this subject that should not be disregarded.

The two great silver-using countries, until within the last five years in the case of Germany, were Germany and France. Even England, the gold-using country, permitted the use of silver subsidiary coin as a legal tender to the extent of forty shillings, about $10 of our money. In France and Germany it was less than $5; it is to-day less than $5, although silver is a good legal tender in France for any amount.

The question on this vote is not (and I trust it will not be obscured by the supposition that it is) as to the relative equality of the two great metals at all; it is simply a question of public convenience, whether a debased subsidiary coinage should be increased in its legal-tender limit or not. I cannot doubt that $10 is the extreme; I believe it would be wiser to retain it at $5 as it is by the present law and has been always in the history of our Government. But it will not be any advantage to those who desire the fullest restoration, the fullest monetization of silver metal, to increase the legal-tender quality of subsidiary coin from ten to twenty dollars; it will not in the least further the advocates of unlimited silver. The question is not that; it is a simple question of propriety and convenience, what may be called the practical convenience of the people, as to allowing debts greater than $10 to be paid in the small coin of the country.

I therefore trust gentlemen will understand that the proposed increase of the legal-tender limit of our subsidiary coin to $20 is not at all in the interest of the further monetization of silver, nor does it bring it in any way into larger use. On the contrary, so far as I can compute the practical effect, I should say that it would be rather adverse to the circulation and use of the standard coin that you should increase the circulation of the debased coin. I hope, therefore, that the action of the Committee on Finance in fixing this limit at $10 may be sustained by the opinion of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague, [Mr. HAMLIN,] if he were present, would vote "yea." I am not able to announce a pair, as this is not strictly a political question.

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to say that on all political questions I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore I ask to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This is not political.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my vote, as he might wish to vote on the other side.

Mr. BAILEY. As this is not a political question, I vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] on political questions. I do not regard this as a political question, and therefore I have voted.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not regard this as a political question myself; but the colleague of the Senator from North Carolina asked me to pair with him, which I do, having promised to do so yesterday.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 21; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance is, in line 1 of section 4, to insert the word "silver" before "coins" and after the word "coins" to strike out the words "of every description;" so as to read:

That all silver coins of the United States of the face value of twenty-five cents and under shall be received at all post-offices for the payment of postage or the purchase of postage-stamps in any sums not exceeding $3.

Mr. BAYARD. There was an amendment proposed yesterday by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to section 3, and also to section 4. It will be seen that section 4 is now relatively useless. It proposes a difference between the amount for which this subsidiary silver coin is made receivable at the post-office, and the amount for which it is made a full tender for dues, public and private, by section 3. There may possibly, therefore, be a confusion between the two sections, and I move that section 4 be stricken out. That would carry all amendments which are proposed to the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That strictly would not be in order until the section is perfected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are any amendments pending——

Mr. CONKLING. While the Chair and the Senate are pausing, may I inquire what became of the amendment I offered to section 3?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair first, as is usual, was putting the question on the amendments reported by the committee, intending then to call attention to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Then will the Chair be kind enough to let me understand, is the amendment now pending to insert "silver" and strike out "of every description?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is pending, but the Senator from Delaware moves to strike out the whole section. If anybody insists on the amendment being voted on first, that must be done before the motion to strike out can be entertained.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to insist upon it, but I understood that the Chair was putting the amendments of the committee, which I have no doubt the Chair was quite right in doing, but I wanted to keep track of my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no one insists upon a vote upon the amendment reported by the committee, the Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to strike out section 4. The Chair hears no call for a vote on the amendment. The question is on the motion to strike out section 4.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fourth section is stricken out of the bill. Now the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] moves to amend the third section by striking out the words "fractional or subsidiary," in the first line, and by inserting in line 2, after the word "coins," the words "of the United States of smaller denomination than $1."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. The title of the bill should be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to amend the title until after the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance how the law is left in respect to the purchase of postage-stamps after striking out section 4. What will be the state of the law if this bill becomes a law with section 4 out?

Mr. BAYARD. There is at present I believe no law regulating the amount for which subsidiary coin can be received at the post-office. The evident design of the fourth section, which I may say was not reported by any committee but was put upon the bill in the House during the course of its consideration, was simply to let the copper coins and the nickel coins be receivable at the post-office in sums of $3. It was considered that this would be cumbersome, awkward, and worse than useless. At first it was thought by the committee that the difficulty would be obviated by inserting the word "silver" before the word "coins" so as to provide that silver coins of twenty-five cents or under should be made receivable for postage-stamps. But it will be obvious I think to the Senate that having in section 3 adopted $10 as a general limitation of the legal-tender quality of subsidiary coin for all dues public and private, there might very well be a confusion as to the construction of sections 3 and 4 if section 4 was allowed to stand, because while we were providing that the subsidiary coin should be a legal tender to the extent of $10 everywhere we were undertaking to restrict it at the post-office and yet repealing all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the act.

Mr. CONKLING. Section 4 having been stricken out, is it the Senator's understanding that section 3 would enable subsidiary coin to be used up to the sum of $10 in purchasing postage-stamps or paying postage?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not say that that is the necessary result. There is no law now limiting the amount or establishing the amount for which the subsidiary coin or any other coin may be received for postage-stamps; but I take it for granted that the ten-dollar limit would prevail; and if we pass the bill without section 4, as much as $10 may be paid at the post-office for postage-stamps in subsidiary coin. This is merely my construction, however.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, in section 1, line 4, after the word "dollar," to insert the words "of a later date than 1861;" so as to read:

That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 of a later date than 1861 may, on presentation of the same in sums of $20, &c.

A word in explanation. There has been about $40,000,000 of the subsidiary coin that has come into circulation since the resumption of silver coinage has commenced; but all the coins issued prior to that date have gone out of the country, many of them into Canada, many into the West India islands, many to the South American republics; and if we offer an opportunity for them to come back here, of course they will be very likely to come. I see, therefore, a great propriety in obviating the objection which was made by the Senator from Ohio, now in the chair, a few days ago against a possibility of large sums being accumulated and brought here from other countries and presented for payment. And besides, they have been subject to large abrasion. I think if this amendment shall be adopted the objection made by the Senator from Ohio will be largely obviated.

Of course it is understood now that we have a sufficiency of these coins for the public use; indeed, in many places there is a glut. We do not, therefore, desire to offer any premium which will be apt to bring these coins that have gone out of the country and are badly worn to compete with those we already have, for if it should happen that we need more we have not yet reached the maximum the Treasury was authorized to issue, which was $50,000,000, the issue only having gone up to about $40,000,000. I can see no objection to this proposition on any side of the Chamber; at least I hope there will be none to it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it may not be improper to say that the amendment of the honorable Senator has been considered elsewhere, and it does not accord with the views of the committee. We believe that this subsidiary coin is the coin of the Government, and should not be discriminated against in the hands of any holder. Moreover, the practical fact will remain that the coin left the country for the convenience of the community where it was taken. The same convenience that called it from the country will keep it there; and I think it would be introducing an element of confusion to provide for the redemption of subsidiary coin of the Government of one date and exclude the coin of the same Government of other dates. As I said before, the same idea of convenience that caused this coin to float out of the country will keep it out; the same facts that made it useful some years ago will make it useful still; and I think it would be an unjust discrimination where the Government of the United States has issued this coin of the same relative standard value that it should discriminate against its coin of certain dates and in favor of its coin of subsequent dates.

For that reason I trust the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont will not receive the approval of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Vermont will not be adopted. I do not think we can afford to make a discrimination against the few silver coins that may bear a date prior to 1861. I cannot conceive that there can be any great number of those coins. Above all, I do not see any force in the objection raised the other day by the honorable Senator from Ohio, now in the chair. We have but a limited amount of these coins in circulation, and they are all or nearly all needed for the general purposes of change throughout the country. Our subsidiary circulation to-day is less than the subsidiary circulation of any country that I know of. Great Britain has to-day a circulation of £20,000,000 of subsidiary coins, and yet they are received by the Bank of England and they are recoined regularly by the Government mints at the cost of the Government when they are depreciated by abrasion or otherwise.

In my judgment, even if this coin should come back there would be no great harm to our people. There will be no difficulty with reference to the coins issued prior to 1861.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance objects to the amendment and as the Senator from Iowa objects to it, I will withdraw the amendment that I have proposed.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BECK. As the amendment is withdrawn I have no speech to make. I rose for the purpose of saying that after listening to the Senator from Vermont for the last sixteen or seventeen years about good faith and national honor and redemption of pledges, he was the last man I expected to hear advising us to repudiate the money of the Government.

Mr. MORRILL. I will offer another amendment to come in at the same place. In section 1, line 4, after the word "dollar," I move to insert the words "not depreciated in value except by natural abrasion;" so as to read:

That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1, not depreciated in value except by natural abrasion, may, on presentation of the same in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor lawful money of the United States.

I take it there will be no objection to this amendment. If the coins are clipped or punched or anything of that sort, they ought not to be received.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Vermont if he does not consider that the point he makes is covered by the existing law?

Mr. MORRILL. This will be a new law.

Mr. BAYARD. The present regulations of the Treasury would prevent the Government from receiving coins artificially lessened in weight.

Mr. MORRILL. I think, as this would be a new law, it might supersede a similar law that we have already passed.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think the amendment is necessary, for the law already covers the same subject-matter. I apprehend that no coins of light weight or artificially abraded would be received at any public depository any more than they would be received by any private bank. In order to make any coin a legal tender for any amount, the law prescribes that it must be a true coin. It cannot be coin artificially lessened in weight, and therefore, in value. Our present regulations will entirely cover that point, I submit to my honorable friend from Vermont.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if we have not already a limit of tolerance, and if any of the coins falling below that limit are receivable?

Mr. MORRILL. I will say in reply to the Senator from Missouri that my only apprehension is that this is to be a new law, and as it provides as to the holder of any silver coin, I have some doubt whether it would not supersede any existing law upon the subject. It is for the Senate to judge. I care nothing more about the matter than any other Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire to say one word in regard to the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Vermont and withdrawn. It was a proposition to do what this Government never has done. In 1853, when the weight of silver in half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes was reduced from 412½ grains to 385 grains, the full, unqualified, unlimited legal-tender power which had by previous laws been given to the half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes prior to that date was left in full force. I say that the Government never has coined a full legal-tender money and undertaken afterward to take away the legal-tender power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. But one word before the bill is voted on. The first section provides that the holder of any silver coins of a less denomination than $1 may deposit them at the Treasury or any assistant treasury of the United States in sums of not less than $20 and receive lawful money therefor, that is greenbacks. That section authorizes these coins to be taken into the Treasury, and when they are received at the Treasury and sub-treasuries legal-tender paper is issued in exchange for them. That retires them into the vaults of the Treasury. How are they to be taken from the vaults of the Treasury and put back into circulation?

Mr. BAYARD. Read section 2.

Mr. COCKRELL. Section 2 provides that the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any of these coins shall exchange the same in sums of $20 or any multiple thereof for lawful money of the United States on the demand of any holder. If the people of this country take these coins to the Treasury and exchange them for greenbacks, why will they take greenbacks back the next day and exchange them for these coins?

Mr. KERNAN. Because change will be wanted. The people will need the coins for change.

Mr. COCKRELL. There has been a continual cry that silver cannot be gotten into circulation in this country. It is hoarded in the Treasury and no honest, legitimate, or fair effort has ever been made to put the silver in circulation. What would this country think of a man who largely in debt and with a large quantity of silver in his vaults would refuse to pay his debts and ask people to come and exchange some other kind of money before he would make any payment of his debts?

This silver is a full legal tender and it should be put in circulation in the payment of the debts and obligations of the Government, and it will stay in circulation when it is put out and debts can be extinguished. I say that the legitimate effect of this bill will be to contract these fractional or subsidiary coins, or coins of less denomination than $1, in the next six to twelve months, from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000. We now have $41,485,438.56 of these coins supposed to be outstanding in circulation, and we have hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury already $6,598,492.44. This money has accumulated in certain places. It will go into the Treasury and it will remain there. The bill does not provide that it shall be paid out.

Mr. BAYARD. When any one demands it, it will be paid out.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ah, if any one demands it and offers to return legal-tender paper—that is, offers to exchange paper circulation, an unlimited legal tender for an unlimited amount, which will at the vaults of the Treasury draw gold. It will be paid out if he will go and give up that kind of money for half dollars and quarter dollars, dimes and half dimes, which are only a legal tender for $10 as the bill has been amended, and which will not pay interest upon the public debt and will not pay any of the bonds issued by the Government.

I was in hopes that the view of the Senator from Michigan would be taken as the test; that these coins could be paid out of the Treasury in payment of the interest upon the public debt and in payment of the bonds; but the law of July 14, 1870, under which all the five percents, the four and one-half percents, and four percents, now constituting nearly two-thirds of the interest-bearing indebtedness of this country, were issued, requires payment in coin of the standard value of the United States. Every solitary bond issued since the 14th of July, 1870, has written upon its face these precise words: "Redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870"—that is, a silver dollar of 412½ grains weight, nine parts fine, or a gold dollar of 25.8 grains weight, nine parts fine. That is the coin, and the only coin, in which these obligations of the Government can be legally paid.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator will remember that I said in reply to a question which he put to me at the time when the bill was pending before, when he made the same point substantially, that if this bill passed and became a law subsidiary silver would be a legal tender to the amount of $10, and to that extent the Secretary could pay it out and compel parties holding obligations against the Government to receive it, except such obligations as have expressed upon their face otherwise. I take that ground now as I did then.

Mr. COCKRELL. I remember that the Senator qualified the position he had taken. I only referred to it to illustrate that the Government will not pay this coin out at all. Now there is no authority for putting these coins in circulation unless the holders of legal-tender paper, an unlimited legal tender for all debts, receivable for customs dues and redeemable in gold at the vaults of the Treasury, will take that paper money and exchange it for the fractional coin, and I think that that will be the legitimate effect of it.

While I am criticising the provisions of this bill many other Senators seem to differ with me as to its effects, and I thought it but due to myself that I should state my fears and my anticipations in regard to it.

Mr. DAWES. I do not quite understand the argument of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] but it would seem to lead to the regret, if this subsidiary coin goes into the Treasury from any point where people do not want the use of it, that the bill does not go so far as to make men take it out of the Treasury whether they want it or not. Men holding legal-tender notes or other coins are not to be compelled to take this subsidiary coin. I suppose if a man wants it more than he wants the legal-tender note that he has in his pocket the bill affords him an opportunity to get it. On the other hand, if a man wants a legal-tender note more than he wants this subsidiary silver coin the bill affords him an opportunity to get that. It affords any man in the prosecution of business an opportunity of obtaining that kind of currency which is of the most advantage to him in his business. It may be that in some localities this subsidiary coin is of greater convenience and greater benefit to business men than legal-tender notes are, and the bill affords means for the accommodation of such business men. At other points it may be that a business man would rather have the legal-tender note than to have the subsidiary silver coin, and the bill affords the means for the accommodation of such a business man.

The truth is, Mr. President, that two elements seem to be lacking in this subsidiary currency. It is not at par, and it does not circulate. It falls where it is used, and it gathers there in quantities more than can be employed in business; and as there is no banking quality in it, no man can dispose of it without suffering a loss. It is below par for two reasons. One reason is because its intrinsic value is less than that of the silver dollar. That was fixed at a time when silver bullion was worth more than silver coin, and it was done in order to prevent this subsidiary silver coin from being gathered up in the arts or passing out of the country. Silver bullion is not now worth as much as silver coin, and no danger from that source would arise. If all this coin were back in the Treasury there is no doubt that it would be better to issue it at the same intrinsic value with the coined dollar, but it is impracticable to get it back; it is impracticable to have two kinds of subsidiary silver coin; and therefore it is out. Now it is out below par in its intrinsic value, and yet the Government has had par for it. The Government can bring it up to par in two ways. They can make it so scarce that the man who wants it is willing to give a premium on its intrinsic value enough to bring it up to par. That would make the holder of this coin pay the discount. The Government having received the full value of it would force those who use it to lift it up to par themselves. The Government has no business to profit by the discount on its own coin any more than on its own paper.

Then, another way is to redeem it for what the Government got for it. That would make the Government itself pay its own discount. If the Government issues a depreciated coin for more than it is intrinsically worth common honesty requires the Government to redeem it at what it got for it; and that is this bill. This bill affords the facility for doing that. It affords also a convenient method of making this more a circulating medium than it is now, because from those localities where it accumulates according to the need of it the bill affords the means of turning it into the other currency of the country, and it gives those who want it more in other localities the opportunity of getting it. It gives it therefore two qualities that are lacking in it. It brings it up to par at the expense of the Government that issued it; and it affords a convenient method of putting it in circulation and keeping it in circulation.

For these reasons it seems to me that it is very desirable that the bill should pass. I cannot quite understand the philosophy of contriving to make a law that would force a man holding another kind of currency, whether he wanted it or not, to take for it this coin. Let the man who wants it take it; let the man who does not want it take the other kind of currency. So far as the Government has any reason to interfere and control the use of the currency of the country, it discharges its duty best when, if we are to have different kinds of currencies, it affords the greatest facility for interchanging each and all of them at par one with another. That keeps them at par; that keeps them in circulation; and the greater the facilities for doing this the more perfect the circulation. That seems to me to be the philosophy of this bill, and that is why I support it.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, I am surprised at the remarks made by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] especially when we take into consideration the vote that he intimated he would give. His fear seems to be that the effect of the bill will be to contract the currency fifteen or twenty million dollars, yet he will vote for the bill. I can see nothing of that kind in this bill. If I thought so, I should not vote for it. None of this subsidary coin can get into the Treasury without an equal amount of greenbacks being paid out. If $5,000,000 of it goes into the Treasury $5,000,000 of greenbacks will go into circulation for it.

Again, another objection that the Senator from Missouri has urged against this measure is explained by the second section of the bill. The Senator says that if this subsidiary coin goes into the Treasury we shall not be able to get it out. We can get it out if the Secretary of the Treasury chooses to pay it out, because section 3 provides:

> That the present silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10 in full payment of all dues, public and private.

Therefore, if this bill becomes a law, this subsidiary coin can be paid for the interest on the public debt, and the principal likewise. If the Government owes any man $10 and he goes to the Treasury to receive it, the Government can pay the whole of it to him in the subsidiary coin if it desires, while it cannot do so now. In other words, the whole idea of this bill runs in this direction—and that is the reason why I am going to vote for it—it appreciates the value of silver. As the law stands to-day, the subsidiary coin can only be used to the extent of $5 in the payment of debts. If this bill becomes a law, it will be received in the payment of debts to the extent of $10. I regret that "$20" was not retained in the bill.

Furthermore it equalizes all of our currency, gold, and silver, and greenbacks. It goes in that direction. It goes in the direction that I have been voting for for years, and to that extent it will accomplish that result. It increases the value of the dimes and five-cent pieces that the poor day laborer has in his pocket. As the law stands to-day, if a man has six dollars' worth of subsidiary coin in his pocket and owes that amount of debt he cannot pay it because it is not a legal tender. If this bill passes, it is a legal tender to the extent of $10. It increases, in other words, the value of the money that is handled mostly by the poor people of the country.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to know of the gentleman who has charge of the bill, since section 4 was stricken out, what relation the bill has to post-office operations. In other words, can a party go to a post-office and buy stamps with this subsidiary coin, and to what amount?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator asks, I suppose, for my construction of the measure.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I should suppose that section 3, fixing the legal-tender limitation of the subsidiary coin at $10, would allow a man having so much to buy postage-stamps to that amount. That is my construction of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then it is rather a mystery to me why the bill originally as it came from the House and as it was reported from the committee of which the gentleman is chairman should have provided in section 4 that a certain amount could be used in the purchase of postage-stamps.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator from Alabama was absent, I suspect, from the former part of this debate or he would have heard the reason stated why section 4 was proposed to be stricken from the bill and why it was stricken from the bill. The bill as it came from the House proposed to allow the copper coin of the Government to the amount of $3 to be made receivable at the post-office. The Senate Committee on Finance did not approve of that proposition, but proposed to restrict the three-dollar limit at the post-office to the subsidiary coin of the face value of twenty-five cents and under. But upon consideration in the Senate it seemed to me, and my suggestion has met the approval of the Senate since by their vote, that there might be a possible confusion between section 4 which contained the limitation of $3 for the purchase of postage-stamps as compared to the limitation of $10 for all dues public and private as provided by the third section. For that reason and to prevent any obscurity in the construction of the law, or any confusion between the construction of the two sections, I proposed, and the Senate approved it, to strike out section 4, so that as the bill now stands, I suppose it is to be a reasonable construction that as the bill makes the subsidiary silver coin of the Government a legal tender for all debts public and private to the amount of $10, the dues of the post-office can be paid as well as anything else.

Mr. HOUSTON. That might be an answer probably to a part of the question; but a party goes to the post-office and proposes to buy a dollar, or two dollars, or half a dozen dollars' worth of stamps for his own use. I ask whether he can use this subsidiary coin in that purchase?

Again, my fear about this bill since the legal-tender feature of it has been stricken down to $10 is that the bill itself will conduct really the subsidiary coin into the Treasury where it will largely remain, and why? Because it is only a legal tender to the amount of $10.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a legal tender only to the amount of $5 now.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am referring to the bill. The bill as amended proposes to make it a legal tender to the amount of $10, instead of $20 as proposed by the House of Representatives. Then those who deal in and take this subsidiary coin for debts and the purposes of business and pay it out, cannot pay it out beyond $10, while in the payment of their debts one, two, a dozen persons may go and pay $10 apiece into any store where they owe a debt, because it is a legal tender to that amount. The merchant, the business man, may take that money and go directly to the Treasury and use it in drawing from the Treasury legal-tender notes, thus getting this coin into the Treasury. Now the Government cannot pay it out except in amounts of $10 under any circumstances.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, it can pay out any amount, $10,000,000, as I showed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am arguing from this bill as it is. Under the legal-tender feature of this bill the Government cannot pay out this silver for the interest upon its bonds.

Mr. BAYARD. Because it is not standard coin.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is not standard coin, and therefore the Government cannot pay it out unless for such debts of the Government as would admit of its being paid, it being a legal tender to the extent of only $10.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will read section 2 he will find that the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States may receive these coins, and is compelled to exchange them if any one desires to receive them.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BAYARD. In any amount.

Mr. HOUSTON. In any amount. There is no doubt about that, and I am not arguing that point, but here is a flow of this subsidiary coin into the Treasury because men can go there with $20 of this silver and get $20 in legal-tender money.

Mr. BAYARD. At once.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir; at once. But then when the Government goes to pay me anything it cannot pay me $20 in this coin, because I will not have it, because the creditor will decline to receive it from the Government in sums larger than he can use it as a legal tender. Therefore that leaves $10 of that $20 in the Treasury. The tendency of the bill, in my judgment, is to convey, to conduct, into the Treasury a much larger amount of this subsidiary coin than it will take out.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the answer is plain. If it does do so, it must be because the convenience of the people dictates that course. The subsidiary coin is made wholly for popular convenience, nothing more than that, as the money for small exchanges. If there be too much of it, if it be redundant, the people ought not to be forced to keep it. It was issued below its value by the Government, and, in my judgment, it is the duty of the Government to redeem its subsidiary coin at any time when it is asked and that the convenience of the people requires. The whole need of this coinage is for popular convenience, and this bill proposes to facilitate its exchange. I had read here the other day a letter from a merchant showing how the country grocers suffer exceedingly from the fact that there is now no redemption point for this redundancy of small change. It is only a question of convenience. If that small change proves to be redundant, its volume should be decreased; public convenience requires it. That is all. If it is desired by the people, the Treasury has it in its power and it is its duty under this bill to pay it out to any man who asks for it. I do not see any possible objection there can be to the present bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not agree with the Senator from Delaware. It is not because of the redundancy of this subsidiary coin that it will flow into the Treasury; but it is because of its want of the quality of being a legal tender. If the bill had remained, letting it be a legal tender for $20, then it could be used otherwise than to flow to the Treasury for the purpose of getting legal-tender notes for it. I mean to say that the bill, in my judgment, discriminates against the men who are compelled to use this money as currency in the purchase of small articles and in the payment of small debts. While they cannot use it beyond $10, while is is only a legal tender for the amount of $10, yet the men who get this money from them may go to the Treasury, and in that way it may be put upon the Government in amounts of $20. Thus those men who use the money in that way, taking it from different parties, may take it to the Treasury and receive legal-tender notes, and I do not see how this coin is to get out again.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire simply to say a word in response to my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] I understood him to say that the third section of this bill provided a way for taking these coins out of the Treasury and putting them in circulation, that it made them a legal tender for all dues public and private, and that the Secretary of the Treasury would pay them out on the interest of the public debt and in payment of the bonds of the Government. I simply desire to say that the present Secretary of the Treasury has not paid, as I understand it, one solitary particle of silver coin in the redemption and payment of any of the coupons on the bonds of the United States, or of any of the bonds. I say further, that we know that he never will pay one solitary particle, not one solitary piece of these subsidiary or fractional coins in payment of interest on the public debt or in payment of any of the bonds; and I do not say that he ought to do it. I am not making that proposition. The Senator from West Virginia thinks that he will do it. I say that he will not do it, first, because he will not even pay the legal-tender dollars——

Mr. HEREFORD. My friend will allow me. I did not say the Secretary would do it; I said the law authorized it. I do not know what the Secretary will do.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then my friend says the law will authorize it. As I stated before, every solitary one of the 5 per cent. bonds of the funded loan of 1881, $558,000,000 of them, the funded loan of 1891, the 4½ per cent. bonds, $240,000,000, and the funded loan of 1907, as I suppose about $700,000,000—these three loans, constituting I believe about two-thirds of the interest-bearing debt of the country—each one of these bonds has upon its face, "Redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870." Now the coin of the standard value on that day was the dollar of 412½ grains weight, nine parts fine, and the gold dollar of 25.8 grains weight and nine parts fine. Under that law and the face of the bonds you cannot discharge one dollar of these bonds with silver of less than 412½ grains weight nine parts fine to the dollar. Therefore not one solitary one of these coins will be paid out of the Treasury in payment of interest on the public debt or in payment or redemption of any of the bonds.

How will it get out of the Treasury? That is the question. I say now that we have six millions and over of this fractional coin in the Treasury already. I say that by the 1st of next January we shall have from fifteen to twenty or twenty-five million dollars of this coin in the Treasury doing nothing. The Senator from Vermont nods assent to that. There is no question about it in my judgment.

Mr. ALLISON. How does the Senator know that these coins are likely to come into the Treasury when all experience shows that from forty to fifty million dollars of fractional money is necessary to carry on the ordinary business of the country? We had forty-eight or fifty million dollars of fractional currency which was coming into or going out of the Treasury all the time, and yet about that amount was kept in circulation by the convenience of the people. That has been dispensed with, and fractional silver coins will take its place. I see no trouble about the matter at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Iowa may not see any trouble; but when the American people can exchange a money, a commodity, an article, merchandise, paper with a promise on it, or gold, or silver, or copper, or anything used as money, for a class of money of greater value, and then turn right around and take the money of greater value and bring out the money of inferior value, you will never find them holding on to the inferior. That is one way of getting this money out of the Treasury. Another way is for the people of the country to take legal-tender money there for it. The only other way is to pay it out on the public dues of the country.

Mr. HEREFORD. Does not the Senator nearly every day of his life take a one-dollar bill and get four quarters for it? And what he does all the other people of the United States do. They do it because they want change which better serves their convenience. As he does, the forty or fifty million people in the United States do likewise.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to ask my friend from West Virginia where is your nearest sub-treasury? Baltimore. I ask him how many of the citizens of West Virginia will take a twenty-dollar bill or a fifty-dollar bill and pay the express charges upon it to Baltimore or New York, draw out the fractional coin, and pay the expressage on that back to their homes in West Virginia? And when they have got it there they have $50 of less value and purchasing power than the fifty-dollar bill they sent for it.

Mr. HEREFORD. Does not the Senator know that they can go to any bank with it? They need not go to New York or Baltimore. Any bank will do it for them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why the use of this bill? If any man can take legal-tender money to any bank in the country and get fractional coin, and can take the fractional coin there and get a greenback for it, what is the use of this bill?

Mr. KERNAN. The banks will not do it unless there is some mode of exchanging it in large sums at the Treasury.

Mr. COCKRELL. But the banks will not pay the expense. I have no disposition to enter into any extended controversy on this question. I desired simply to state what will be the effect in my humble opinion, and that is that this bill will take into the Treasury and hold there fifteen or twenty millions of the forty-one millions outstanding fractional coin, and it will not go out of the Treasury again because men will not go and exchange greenbacks for it. They may do it here for convenience' sake, and they may do it in a few cities; but the great masses of the people of this country cannot do it. They are not so situated that they can reach the Treasury. They are not so situated that they can reach the banks to make these exchanges when change becomes scarce.

The other and only way of getting it out is to pay it out on public dues. Now, we know what the Secretary of the Treasury will do with it. Every man knows that he will not pay one solitary dollar out of the Treasury in these fractional coins. He will not pay the silver dollar, the old standard dollar of 412½ grains' weight. He will exchange that with any gentleman who will take greenbacks there or gold and give it to him in exchange for them, but he will not, he has not, and he does not intend to pay out that silver dollar in payment or redemption of the interest-bearing indebtedness of this country, the coupons or the bonds.

There is another point in connection with this. I do not believe in establishing the principle that the silver and gold dollars of this country are redeemable in anything. They should be given unlimited legal-tender power. I am in favor of the equalization of silver and putting it upon a perfect equality with gold, and then I am not in favor of redeeming these gold or silver coins in any other kind of promises, money, or anything else. They are irredeemable and without price.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it desired to have a separate vote upon the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no; we do not want a separate vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no separate vote is asked for the question will be put in gross in concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the title by striking out "twenty" and inserting "ten."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to move to reconsider the vote by which this bill passed. I am so satisfied on consideration that it is wrong that I wish the Senate to reconsider it and consider it some more. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BAYARD. Has the amendment to the title been made?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not yet in order until we determine the question of reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill. Until that is disposed of the title cannot be amended.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the motion to reconsider prevent the consideration of the amendment to the title?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all. The title is the last thing to be considered. It can be amended after the question of reconsideration is disposed of. The Senator from Vermont moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment to the title proposed by the Senator from Delaware will be made if there be no objection. The title thus amended will be the title of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BUTLER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

DEPARTMENT OFFICERS ON THE FLOOR OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the consent of the Senate to take from the table Senate bill No. 227 in order to move its reference to a Committee.

No objection being made, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 227) to provide that the principal officers of each of the Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the bill be referred to a select committee to be appointed by the Chair, to consist of ten members.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to refer the bill to a select committee of ten.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is too many.

Mr. PENDLETON. The purpose of making it ten is that the Committee may be appointed equally from both sides of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But they may be equally divided. Make it eleven, if you want a decision.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am not afraid that we cannot get a report from the committee even if they should be equally divided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

USE OF TROOPS.

Mr. CALL. I move to take up a bill now lying on the table, Senate bill No. 621, authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the bill be reported at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks that the bill be reported at length. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONKLING. Having learned that this is the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] I will not ask to have it read. I did not know upon what bill we were about to vote, but I know it now.

Mr. MCDONALD. The Senator from Florida wishes to make some remarks on it.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon. I thought it was some other bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps the Senator from Florida would prefer to speak to morrow, as it is getting on in the afternoon, and would yield to a motion for an executive session, as there is some executive business to be attended to.

Mr. CALL. I am willing to abide the pleasure of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, then, with the permission of the Senator from Florida, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. CALL. I dislike to object if the Senator wishes to make the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 22.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I should not have ventured to submit any observations to the Senate upon the bill now before it or upon the other bills which have been passed by Congress and have received the veto of the President of the United States, or which are now under consideration, had it not been that the questions presented in them concern my own people, and concern them not in respect to the charges which have been made by Senators upon the other side, but in respect to those things in which all the people of the United States are interested—in the cause of good government, in the cause of the preservation of the National Government, in the cause of the purity of the administration of justice, and the preservation of private right.

I have heard in the course of the argument upon this subject a great deal said, and said with the most profound learning and distinguished ability on this side of the Chamber, and I have heard on the other side a splendid effort by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and a speech of extraordinary ability and learning by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] But in their arguments on the other side, while there was much said upon the subject of the national power, upon strengthening the great powers of the nation, there was not one word said in favor of the protection of individual right, of the preservation of personal liberty, or of those great guarantees which are as much a part of the National Constitution and the National Government as any of its powers, and which indeed constitute its great purpose.

The bill now before the Senate proposes to define and to limit the uses for which the military power of the Government may be employed. It may be considered in connection with the bills which have already been discussed relating to the election laws and to the laws prescribing the qualifications for jurors in the Federal courts. These laws may properly be considered in relation to the Constitution and our system of laws, and in their effect upon the people of the country. I am free to say if the charges which have been made here by the Senators from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] and Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and New York [Mr. CONKLING] and by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] are true; if it be true, as has been said by the Senator from Minnesota, that the whole or a great part of the white population of the Southern States are engaged in a work of oppression, of robbery, of murder, of bloodshed; that some four millions of colored people in those States are fleeing from their homes because of their cruelty and oppression; if it be true, as has been said, that the entire seven millions of white people in those States are implicated in the work of assassination and of murder; if it be true, as has been said by the Senator from Minnesota, that nearly half, if not quite, of the population of the great North, who are known under the description of democrats and the democratic party, were engaged during the war in treachery to their own people and to the National Government and the national cause; if it be true that they are now plotting sedition, conspiracy, and treason against the National Government, then I am willing to admit that the argument is well founded and these laws should be sustained. I am willing to go further, as the argument and the propositions of the Senator from Minnesota demand. I am willing to concede that the cause of free government has entirely failed, and that a military power and a despotic government are necessary for this people. But if this is not true, if it be untrue, and these Senators have been misinformed; if the fact be that there is no geographical line that marks the domain of virtue, of religion, and of Christianity, that south of the Potomac and south of the line that heretofore divided the States which were slave and those which were free the Christian virtues live, the Almighty God is worshiped, the temples of religion are built, and society is pure in that country which in the early period of our history gave the fathers to the Republic, then the case is different. The distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has found no literature there, or he has found it difficult to obtain any, and could only find a book which I have never seen nor heard of; he could only find sentiments which no southern man has ever heard in his own part of the country—of depreciation, hostility, and of hatred toward the people of the North; yet that part of the country, although he could find no other literature but this, gave the fathers to the Republic and created in great part the National Government itself with its national powers. They have transmitted to the people who now live there learning, Christianity, virtue, and patriotism. The people who have succeeded them have their hearts as open to the appeals of charity, to compassion for a human being, whether he is white or black, as any who live north of that line. We may therefore dismiss from our view these considerations and enter upon a calm and a dispassionate investigation of these laws and ascertain how far they are compatible with the Constitution of this country, with the spirit of a free government, with the cause of impartial trials; how far they promote the public morals or how far they contribute to the prostitution of the courts of justice to the use of perjury and subornation of perjury in the trials before them; how far they punish the innocent, and how far they permit the guilty to escape.

Mr. President, these laws are in many respects the most extraordinary laws for the punishment of political offenses that have ever been passed by any government or that have ever prevailed at any period of time. In one section they impose a qualification for voters; in another they give to the courts of the United States the right to sit in trial upon the title to office of all the officers of a State. In another section they impose punishments for aiding, abetting, and counseling political offenses; in others they prescribe penalties for attempts to commit crime, for offers to vote. In all these respects these laws are not consistent with the spirit of a free government.

It seems strange that it should be necessary here in the Senate of the United States to refer to the spirit which characterizes such laws in the language of the ancient commentators upon public law. It is strange, indeed, that we should find in existence laws which punish as attempts to commit crime offers to vote, aiding, abetting, assisting, and counseling others in what is termed in the act unlawful means, provisions of law which provide that the quasi-judicial discretion committed to the State officers of election should be decided and governed by the discretion of a Federal judge upon a subject which the Constitution expressly withholds from the National Legislature—a subject which it will be admitted by all it has no power to legislate upon; for I presume no Senator on the other side of the Chamber will say that Congress has any power to prescribe the qualifications of a voter. All will admit that the Constitution by a perpetual ordinance has declared that the members of Congress shall be elected by electors having the "same qualifications as those prescribed for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature;" and in so doing it has by such perpetual ordinance removed beyond all possibility the exercise of any power of legislation by the Federal Congress in prescribing the qualifications of a voter for a member of Congress.

I ask, then, and I ask the learned Senator from Vermont, how can Congress have the power to punish as an offense the violation of a law which they have no power to prescribe? The judicial power of the United States by the Constitution can extend only to cases which arise under the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance of it.

No act of Congress can give to the judicial power of the United States the right to sit and try a case to which, by the Constitution, it does not extend. I say, then—and it is a proposition which, I take it, all the learning and ability of Senators on the other side of the Chamber cannot meet and cannot answer—that if the Constitution prohibits perpetually the Federal Government from prescribing the qualifications of a voter, if it prohibits it in requiring a member of Congress to be elected by electors "having the same qualifications as those prescribed by the State for the most numerous branch of its Legislature," how can Congress undertake to punish as a crime and as an offense an interpretation of that law thus made by the State which Congress has no power to legislate upon in any respect or to any extent?

It is sought to find this power in the terms of the clause giving a right to Congress to change the place and the manner and the time of the election, but these terms do not import anything in respect to the qualifications of the elector.

In Minors vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., S. C. Reps., 170, the Supreme Court of the United States say "the United States has no voters in the States of its own creation." Again in the same case they say "being unanimously of opinion that the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the constitutions and laws of the several States which commit that trust to them alone," &c.

These laws punish conspiracies which rest in the intention; punish attempts or offers to do certain things which are of necessity vague and uncertain and rest in the mind; they proscribe as crimes acts uncertain and indeterminate, and when we consider the class of jurors and the class of witnesses which are to be found in the courts of the country, especially in the South, and perhaps in many other portions of the country, they are precisely such as are described by the great commentator upon English law, they come within the description of that class of political offenses which under the despotic rulers of England had to be restrained by the statutes passed in the interest of freedom and of personal liberty. Blackstone says, book 4, page 75:

> If the crime of high treason be indeterminate this alone (says the president, Montesquieu) is sufficient to make any government degenerate into arbitrary power. And yet by the ancient common law there was a great latitude left in the breast of the judges to determine what was treason or not so; whereby the creatures of tyrannical princes had opportunity to create abundance of constructive treasons, that is, to raise by forced and arbitrary constructions offenses into the crime and punishment of treason which were never suspected to be such.

Again, on page 78, book 4:

> But as this compassing or imagining is an act of the mind, it cannot possibly fall under any judicial cognizance unless it be demonstrated by some open or overt act.

And yet the tyrant Dionysius is recorded to have executed a subject barely for dreaming that he had killed him, which was held of sufficient proof that he had thought thereof in his waking hours. But such is not the temper of the English laws. The statute expressly requires that the accused "be thereof upon sufficient proof attainted of some open act by men of his own condition."

And yet there are sections in these laws which punish as a conspiracy going upon the highway in disguise with intent, &c., to deprive some one of their rights attempts to vote; which punish aiding, abetting, advising, assisting, or counseling some person to do an unlawful act.

But, Mr. President, I will not attempt to review at length the sections of the election laws. They culminate and find their point in the following section of the Revised Statutes, under which in connection with the other sections there has been as much oppression of innocence, as much improper, arbitrary, and cruel punishment, as ever disgraced the records of any government, despotic or free. The section to which I refer, 2022, provides as follows:

> The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States.

The Senator from Vermont, in the elaborate and able effort in which he sought to justify this law and the use of military force in reference to elections, cited the statutes from Washington to Grant, and found in them, as he insisted, abundant ground for the use, in the discretion of the President, of military force in aid of this law. It cannot be denied that this statute which is now sought to be repealed does authorize the arrest "without process" of any citizen before he has voted. It cannot be denied that this is a power which may be exercised to any extent. It is without justification in the entire history of this country. The statutes which have been cited by the Senator from Vermont have no application to such a case. The Constitution of the United States furnishes the great rule by which all its statutes must be construed. That Constitution in favor of the personal liberty of the citizen guarantees to him absolute immunity from arrest without process under any and all circumstances. Blackstone, in book 1, page 125, says:

> Of great importance to the public is the preservation of this personal liberty, for if it were once left in the power of any the highest magistrate to imprison arbitrarily whomever he or his officers thought proper, as in France it is daily practiced by the Crown, there would soon be an end of all other rights.
> To bereave a man of life or by violence to confiscate his estate without accusation or trial would be so gross and notorious an act of despotism as must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the whole kingdom; but confinement of the person by secretly hurrying him to jail, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten, is a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government.

Again, on page 131, same book, he says:

The law of England regards, asserts, and preserves the personal liberty of individuals. * * * The language of the great charter is that no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned but by the lawful judgment of his equals or by the law of the land.

"This means," says Lord Coke, "without due process of law;" and Judge Story says "the words in the Constitution 'nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law,' in effect affirm the right of trial according to the process and proceedings of the common law." (3 Story on Con., 661.)

I heard with amazement the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, which I say is not sustained by a single statute cited by him, that it has always been lawful for the President to execute the laws and preserve the peace of the United States, and describing that peace as that orderly peace which is required in the execution of its laws. I ask what does the term "execute the laws" mean? I am surprised that in the Senate an argument so ingenious and so learned should have been made on this point. What does the term "execute the laws of the United States" mean, as used in these statutes? The Constitution prescribes that there shall be an executive, a legislative, and a judicial department. It makes the judicial department the guardian, and it makes it hold watch and ward over every house, however humble, and over every citizen, wheresoever or whomsoever he may be. His personal liberty is among the most important of his privileges; and no President, no marshal, no deputy marshal, no other man, can, without the process of a court, undertake to arrest or deprive any person of his liberty or of his right to vote.

These ought to be cardinal principles, and yet it seems as if this whole domain of judicial power had been disregarded alike by the Senator from Vermont and by the President of the United States in the consideration of the question. There never was a law, there never was an argument, by which the President or any other person under the Constitution can be justified in the arrest of any individual without the process of a court. The term "The President shall execute the laws" has application to the judicial decrees, the judgments of its courts; and outside of this and the collection of the revenue, the collection of the customs, the repelling of foreign invasions, the suppression of domestic violence upon the call of the Legislature or executive of a State, there is no possible opportunity for any exercise of executive power in the arrest of an individual or the use of the military force of the country. The judicial power guards every application of the law. The President of the United States can make no application of the law; a deputy marshal, the executive department of the Government can make none. It is perfectly plain that these are propositions which are fundamental truths. I ask how can this power to arrest a citizen without process before he has voted be sustained if it be true that the judicial power extends its arm over the citizen and guards him in the use and enjoyment of all his rights and immunities, and especially in his personal liberty?

This is a power which will destroy the National Government. There has been much said about State rights, and it has been endeavored to confuse this question and intermix it with the former theories of State and national powers and with the war and its prejudices and resentments. It is true that the rights of the States may be involved in it, but I am regarding it as a question of the power of the National Government, and I say that the greatest assault, the most serious injury, which these laws have done, or will do, is to the National Government and to its powers and its perpetuity. The assault is not upon the States alone, nor so much as it is an assault upon the principles and the character of the Government. Mr. Webster said in one of his great speeches, which I have here:

The hand that destroys the Constitution rends our Union asunder forever.

In another speech, which I will quote, in reference to the very argument which the Senator from Vermont has made in his elaborate citation of the statutes with great ingenuity and with great ability, the proposition made by the Senator in that great speech was years ago met upon the floor of this Senate and discussed and denied and utterly banished from the realm of reason and consideration by the great expounder of the Constitution and of the law, the great statesman of Massachusetts—perhaps the great statesman of America. And just here permit me to say in reference to the assaults and charges that have been made here that in the past time that great statesman had followers in the South, not few, but numbered by many thousands. Henry Clay and Daniel Webster had, even to the time when the unhappy war occurred, a vast following which was nearly a majority, and there are perhaps a larger portion of that people who have been educated in the precepts and in the construction and in the rules of construction of the Constitution announced by Mr. Webster than of any other man. But I said that the whole argument of the Senator from Vermont has been met, and conclusively met, by Mr. Webster.

It will be remembered that the Senator from Vermont finds in the statutes of the United States a power in the discretion of the President to "execute and enforce the laws," as he terms it. I said that the President of the United States has no power to execute and enforce the laws except in the case of a sentence and a decree of a court where it relates to individual right, except in the case of domestic insurrection upon the application of a State executive or Legislature, except to repel foreign invasion in the legitimate mode either with the sanction of Congress or without it, afterward obtaining it, as has occurred once in the history of this country, and except in the collection of the customs and the revenues, a distinct department clearly and broadly defined, there is not and there never was any authority and never can be under our free Government for the President to use military force for any purpose whatever.

The Senator from Vermont finds in these statutes this general power. The Senator from New York finds the power not only under the acts sought to be repealed but in all the past history of the country. The issue is plain and distinct. Mr. Webster in 1832, in a great and deliberate speech, in full concurrence with all that he had previously uttered, said:

We are told, sir, that the President will immediately employ the military force and at once blockade Charleston.

A military remedy, a remedy by direct belligerent operation, has been thus suggested, and nothing else has been suggested, as the intended means of preserving the Union. Sir, there is no little reason to think that this suggestion is true. We cannot be altogether unmindful of the past; and therefore we cannot be altogether unapprehensive for the future. For one, sir, I raise my voice beforehand against the unauthorized employment of military power, and against superseding the authority of the laws by an armed force, under pretense of putting down nullification. The President has no authority to blockade Charleston; the President has no authority to employ military force till he shall be duly required so to do by law, and by the civil authorities. His duty is to cause the laws to be executed. His duty is to support the civil authority. His duty is, if the laws be resisted, to employ the military force of the country, if neccessary, for their support and execution; but to do all this in compliance only with law, and with the decisions of the tribunals.

This applied to the strongest case that can be found for the Senator from Vermont's argument. It applied to a threatened combination to resist the collection of the customs, to resist the collection of the revenues of the country, a distinct department. It referred to the President's calling upon the Army and the Navy to do that which the Government had an undoubted right in some respects to do without reference to the courts of the country. But yet it was held by him that so limited was this power that it could only be done in conformity with the decisions of the judicial tribunals of the country.

It applies now to the execution of the laws—to the President's constitutional duty to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed"—and this "care for their faithful execution" is that the great principle of the Constitution and of all free government, that they shall be executed only after they shall have been applied by "due process of law" by the judicial tribunals, shall not be subverted by the President or any one else but shall be observed as well by the President as by the humblest citizen in the land.

But how, I ask, is it in reference to a case of personal liberty, to a case where a man is tried not in a court but by a deputy marshal or by the President, by the executive power of the country—how is that? Does the Constitution afford no guarantee to personal rights? Is a man's personal liberty subject alone to the will of the President? These laws, beyond all doubt, authorize the President of the United States and his marshals and deputy marshals to "arrest" any man without process who in the judgment of a deputy marshal "attempts or offers to vote" unlawfully on election day. It authorizes him again to keep the peace. That is entirely unauthorized by our National Constitution. Every individual and his posterity for all time to come have the right of personal liberty, the right to vote under the guardianship of the judicial power. Waiving all question of State rights, I say it is treason against the National Constitution, against the National Government, that these laws shall be permitted to be executed. Let us see.

Mr. Webster said:

By the law of the land, is most clearly intended, the general law; a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is, that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not therefore to be considered the law of the land. If this were so, acts of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, acts of confiscation, acts reversing judgments, and acts directly transferring one man's estate to another, legislative judgments, decrees, and forfeitures in all possible forms, would be the law of the land.

Such a strange construction would render constitutional provisions of the highest importance completely inoperative and void. It would tend directly to establish the union of all powers in the Legislature. There would be no general permanent law for courts to administer, or for men to live under. The administration of justice would be an empty form, an idle ceremony.

Now, I ask, how justify a power in a deputy marshal to arrest a man without process before he has voted upon election day? How justify the employment of the Army and the Navy of the United States, its military power, and an army of deputy marshals to sustain an arrest thus made without judicial process, without warrant? What becomes of the Constitution of the United States which says that a man shall be protected against arrest without accusation, that he shall have a fair trial? What becomes of these clauses of the Constitution, all of which are pregnant upon the subject? I read from the fourth article of amendments:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

And the sixth article of amendments:

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

How reconcile these clauses with this power of a deputy marshal, of a President, of an executive officer, to interfere with the elector's right, and to arrest him and hold him without judicial process, in the face of these clauses of the Constitution? There is no justification for it. It is properly described by Mr. Webster in the following sentence in another of his speeches:

No one can be a true and intelligent friend of that liberty, who will consent that any man in public station, whatever he may think of the honesty of his motives, shall exercise or enact an authority above the Constitution and the laws.

Is there a man here who will take this law which says—and it has been twice reaffirmed by the President of the United States and by gentlemen of high consideration and ability upon the other side—that a deputy marshal shall arrest a citizen "before" he has voted "without judicial process," and reconcile it with these provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and relieve it from the condemnation which Mr. Webster pronounced upon it in these words:

Whatever government is not a government of laws, is a despotism, let it be called what it may.

Mr. President, is it not strange that this power, which has been denied by all the other great men of the past besides Mr. Webster, this power contained in these laws and upon which they center to arrest a man upon the day of election by the President of the United States, to arrest all men by the President of the United States without accusation, without judicial process, without trial, without being confronted with the witnesses, without conviction, without condemnation by a jury—is it not strange that this power of arrest should be contended for here though in every free government it has been guarded and closely guarded as the means by which the whole fabric of the state might be subverted and which has been described in the following words by Justice Story:

No remark is better founded in human experience than that of Montesquieu, that "there is no liberty, if the judiciary power be not separated from the legislative and executive powers." And it is no less true, that personal security and private property rest entirely upon the wisdom, the stability, and the integrity of the courts of justice. If that government can be truly said to be despotic and intolerable in which the law is vague and uncertain, it cannot but be rendered still more oppressive and more mischievous when the actual administration of justice is dependent upon caprice or favor, upon the will of rulers, or the influence of popularity. When power becomes right, it is of little consequence whether decisions rest upon corruption or weakness, upon the accidents of chance or upon deliberate wrong. In every well-organized government, therefore, with reference to the security both of public rights and private rights, it is indispensable that there should be a judicial department to ascertain and decide rights, to punish crimes, to administer justice, and to protect the innocent from injury and usurpation.

Mr. President, I will not take time to read further upon this subject from books. I state it as a proposition which cannot be denied, that this provision and any provision of any law which authorizes anybody to arrest a man without process, which removes his personal liberty from the domain of the judicial power, is not only unconstitutional but it is despotic and arbitrary and utterly inconsistent with the right of a free people.

But let us go further. The Senator from Vermont finds in an elaborate speech the power to enforce this law in the provisions of the statute which give to the marshals of the United States the same powers as sheriffs of the States, and he says that in the State of Vermont the liberty-loving people of Vermont in all time have had a statute by which a sheriff could arrest any man for disturbing the peace or call out the whole militia to quell a riot, and therefore under the statute of the United States giving the same power to the marshal that the sheriffs have under State law they may exercise the power to keep the peace, and this great power of arresting a citizen upon the day of election by a deputy marshal or a marshal or the President, and of calling the Army and the Navy of the United States to sustain it—a power which is to protect the unhappy colored man, it is said, against the white people of the Southern States and native citizens against the citizen of foreign birth in the exercise of his suffrage!—this great power to be exercised in the great cities of the country finds its justification in the provision of the Federal statutes that the marshals shall have the same power as the sheriffs. Nobody will deny—the learned Senator from Vermont will not himself for a moment deny—that the Federal statutes must be construed with reference to the great organic distribution of power contained in the Constitution of the United States. He will not say that there is any power in the vast powers of that instrument which removes the arrest of a citizen from the domain of judicial power and judicial cognizance. He will not say that there is any power in the Constitution of the United States by which a man can be indicted and punished under an act of Congress for a riot or for a breach of the peace.

I am astonished, I am amazed, Mr. President, at such a proposition. I say that this power cannot be sustained. I do not mean to disparage the Senator from Vermont, for he is a distinguished man of great powers of intellect and research, but I say that no man can truthfully assert and that he will not contend that there is any power in the Constitution of the United States which authorizes Congress to pass a law by which a man can be arrested, indicted, and punished in the courts of the United States for a breach of the peace or for an affray or for a riot. All the vast powers of this Government are pledged to the enforcement of every law of the United States passed in pursuance of the Constitution, but it must be enforced by the application of the law by the judicial power, because the Government is judicial, legislative, and executive. It must be enforced, according to the Constitution, in the case of domestic violence, upon the demand of a State; it must be enforced in the case of the collection of customs and revenue, which are the only things in which there may be an arbitrary power, under the laws of Congress. That is the law, the supreme and paramount law, of the United States; and to claim that there can be an arrest by a marshal for a breach of the peace or for a riot is a violation of all principle. How can there be an indictment? I ask under what section and clause of the Constitution of the United States can a man be indicted for a mere affray, for a breach of the peace?

In United States vs. Cruikshanks et al., 2 Otto, 550, the Supreme Court say:

If a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance and that of the State by a breach of the peace in the assault.

Again, on 556, the court say:

The charge made is nothing more than a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace within the State. Certainly it will not be claimed that the United States have the power or are required to do mere police duty within the States.

Again, on page 551, the Supreme Court say:

The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under jurisdiction of the States.

It is claimed that the jurisdiction of the United States, by the Senator from New York, very justly and truly, in the ceded places, in the places under its exclusive jurisdiction, in its fortified places, results because of the place; but in regard to all other matters, it is either in regard to citizenship as between two citizens of different States or in regard to the question under a law of the United States or some right growing up under the Constitution or laws of the United States, but there can be no territorial jurisdiction, no general jurisdiction; and even under this law or any other law, what is complained of? It is that there has been a resistance to the laws of the United States touching the election of a member of Congress. A mere breach of the peace or a fight between two persons does not concern or affect that. They are two distinct subjects, and this, which is so plain in itself, has been expressly so decided by the Supreme Court, as we have already seen.

The Senator from Vermont will not say that a man can be indicted, convicted, and punished by any court of the United States for a mere breach of the peace, for an affray, for an assault and battery; and if he cannot say that, when the marshal takes him under this law and the Army and Navy are summoned to sustain him in that arrest, what is it? It is false imprisonment under the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the National Government itself; and if it be a false imprisonment which the Army and Navy of the United States are summoned to carry into effect, I ask what then is it and by what name shall we designate this arrest and imprisonment of a citizen of the United States in the act of exercising the elective franchise and the calling out of the military force of the country to sustain it? Mr. President, it is a subversion of the National Government and the national Constitution and its national powers. In the language of Mr. Webster, "It is a despotic use of the powers of the Government without the authority of the Constitution or the laws."

I will not impute motives. I take it for granted that all this arises from the blind rage of party zeal. I take it that upon all sides of the Chamber and throughout the country everywhere, as we discovered in the late unhappy war, the feelings which take possession of men give color to their convictions. I will not say nor will I believe that Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have engaged in such extraordinary denunciations of those upon this side are insincere; I will not say that their purpose is to subvert the Government of this country and to establish a military and a despotic government; but it is exceedingly strange that a law with these provisions can be sustained by them, a law which strikes at the individual liberty of every citizen, a law which violates the direct terms of the Declaration of Independence, which says that governments are instituted for what? Instituted to preserve the individual rights of the citizen. Let me read the language:

That among these [rights] are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men.

It will be remembered that this is the very point, the individual liberty of the citizen, which this law in plain, open, unequivocal, distinct terms avers shall be taken away "without process," without accusation, without trial, and which it is said in two vetoes of the highest officer of this Government shall be sustained by the whole military power of this country. It is this very right of personal liberty which the Declaration of Independence speaks of in these distinct and unequivocal terms which Mr. Webster, Mr. Story, and Blackstone have all declared to be of the very essence of civil liberty and the great object of government.

Mr. President, I have looked at this law in this light alone, and I will not proceed to a general consideration of all the sections of the Constitution relating to it. There are more of them which are violated by the provisions of these statutes than there are which are not. A majority of the great articles, leaving out of view the reserved rights of the States, leaving out of view the domain of power which has been admitted in the argument of the health bill and the other bills which have been before the Senate, to be retained in the States, and looking only at the national powers conferred—there are more of the provisions of the great articles by which the powers of the Government are conferred which are violated by these laws than there are which are left untouched. The right of impartial trial by jury, the right of being confronted by witnesses, the right of accusation, the right of counsel,—all these great provisions are directly interfered with. The power to vote; the right, the great instrument by which the Government is to be preserved, has been effectually taken away.

But, Mr. President, I will pass on. I thought it proper to say so much in reference to this provision of the law. I have not time nor have I the purpose to discuss its provisions at length. I will proceed to do that which induced me to take the floor. I said that these laws were to be considered in reference to their effect upon the public morals and the perpetuity of the Government, in reference to the preservation of purity in the administration of the courts of justice. In my own State under these laws the judicial power is being now used for the purpose of determining an election to the Congress of the United States. Under these laws opportunity is offered for perjury and subornation of perjury. The history of the administration of these laws in my State has been to punish the innocent and to protect the guilty.

I do not believe there can be found a man upon the other side of the Chamber who if the proposition were made to him to punish his deadliest enemy by perjury and by subornation of perjury, by a partial jury selected for the purpose of conviction—I do not believe that there is a man upon the other side of the Chamber, steeped as he may be in party zeal and party bitterness, who would not denounce and reject such a dishonorable proposition. But, sir, such is the fact. The courts of justice are being used, and have been used for ten years, as the instruments of perjury and subornation of perjury and of partial trials. I say it openly and fearlessly and that conviction prevails, and prevails largely. The statement that the white people of the Southern States are engaged in oppression and robbery and murder is untrue; but the statement is true that under these laws the administration of justice is prostituted to the foul purposes of partisan hatred, of individual and personal ends, and that perjury and subornation of perjury are their familiar and their accustomed instrumentalities.

Now, sir, let me recapitulate a few instances which are historical, which cannot be denied, and which will prove what I have affirmed. In 1872, under the operation of these election laws, three of the State senators in the Legislature of Florida were arrested and carried from their homes upon a false charge as the Legislature was about to organize, and they were held there until they could give bail. The proceeding ended there, and was a party movement. In 1874 two men, honest, upright men, possessing the confidence and esteem of their community, who were inspectors of the State election in the county of Hamilton when a member of Congress was to be elected, refused to canvass a false return, a return which they had reason to believe was forged, and which the proof subsequently evidenced was a false and forged return. They were arrested by an affidavit made before a commissioner of the Federal court in Jacksonville; they were dragged from their homes; they were indicted for nothing but that refusal to recognize a return. They remained for nearly two months under bonds at expense, and were discharged without trial; and from that day to this there has been no further prosecution, no further attempt to convict; but it is a part of the public history of the country that the return which they refused to canvass was a false return.

There has not been an election for the last ten years in which this law and the powers of the court have not been used for party purposes. At this time respectable citizens of Gadsden County, one a republican, are indicted under one of the sections of this law for conspiracy. That is the term when there is no evidence of any plausible offense. A district attorney who is indifferent to the obligation of an oath and willing to tear innocent men from their families and send them to the penitentiary on suborned and perjured evidence in the interest of his party, with the assistance of a test-oath jury, can at any time get up a conspiracy against any one. In this case the republican, a Mr. Cook, voted for the democratic candidates in his county. He was one of the State inspectors at his precinct, and in that capacity ordered one of the supervisors to sit somewhere else than in the window through which the ballots were passed, and to refrain from taking the tickets away from the voters and substituting others. This was decided to be a conspiracy on the part of the republican State inspector and the democratic candidate, and they were carried two hundred miles from their homes, held to bail in $3,000 each by the chief supervisor in Jacksonville, indicted and held for trial, subjected to an expense of more than a thousand dollars for performing a duty imposed by the State law, and for performing it in the manner required by the law.

No man, however deep and bitter a partisan he is, should tolerate a law which ministers through partisan hatred and through perjury to the interests and the ends of base and selfish men. The proposition is as to how far these laws are consistent with the rights of the citizen, with the purity of the courts of justice, or how far they are the instruments of personal enmity, of personal ambition, and how far their instrumentalities are those of perjury and falsehood.

I sat in a court within the past six months where I saw a poor ignorant man convicted under this law for being what might be called an accomplice in concealing the alteration of a return made by the witness who testified against him and bought immunity from punishment by his evidence. I saw this man convicted of making a false certificate as an officer of the State election where a member of Congress was being voted for, for concealing the crime of another in altering a return; and he was sentenced to the penitentiary for three years, while the man who had committed the crime, a man of intelligence, who had purchased his immunity with his testimony, whether true or false, was permitted to go untouched.

While that trial was going on there sat at the bar of that court men who had proclaimed throughout the whole United States that they had been a party to the alteration and the forgery and the perjury by which the return from Archer box No. 2, in the county of Alachua, in the presidential election of 1876, was raised so as to cast votes enough to give a majority for the republican electors of that State—who had sworn before the people of the United States to this fact, and had produced the original return for which a false and forged return had been substituted—sitting there unmolested, unarraigned, unindicted, unconvicted; and this poor ignorant man, for merely concealing the crime of another, now serves under a sentence of hard labor in the penitentiary for three years, while these other and far greater criminals are unpunished.

I ask Senators who can say that is not a partisan administration of justice. When I make this allusion I do not desire to make any reference to the President of the United States or to inculpate him. I do not desire to cast any reflections upon him or upon his title to the office he holds. I consider the commission, whether right or wrong, which rendered its decision, exculpated him from any part in the transaction. That is my opinion on that subject; but I insist that no man can truly claim that is not a partisan administration of justice and deny that the law which permits and tolerates such things ought not to be sustained and kept in force.

Mr. President, is it possible that in the Senate of the United States partisan hatred, zeal for the success of party, can go so far as to stain the administration of justice, as to require it to run through polluted channels, as to make its instrumentalities those of perjury? Can it be denied that in a court and under a law which admits political offenses to be tried it is necessary that there should be selected as the triers, as the men through whom this impartial trial is to be administered, those who are entirely competent for the purpose and entirely disinterested, who are the peers of the accused in the sense of the common law, in the justice, in the honesty, and the general morality of the community, in the purpose to do right? These laws as they stand are branded in the consciousness of those among whom they are administered with the stain of partiality, of oppression. The juries which have tried these men for the most part have been composed of men who were utterly unworthy to represent the respectable men of any party. There have been some good men now and then, but as a general rule the men who are found on the juries in the trial of these political offenses are not in the judgment of the community fair and impartial men.

In 1874, in the State of Florida, a man who had been a senator of that State in the State Legislature for many years, who had been temporarily the governor of the State, was arrested under this law upon a charge of alleged intimidation at an election. The intelligent portion of the community testified in one way and on the other side were a few bitter partisans and some very ignorant persons. He was convicted while the testimony in his favor was of a competent character, of the best men in the community, of men who had for a lifetime acquired a character for veracity and fidelity to every obligation. Their testimony was disregarded by a jury selected by men who were bitterly prejudiced, of men who were of the class it was sure would be prejudiced and would attach undue influence to the power of the public prosecutor; he was convicted and sentenced and served out a sentence of six months in the common jail.

At this time there stands indicted in the Federal court in my State a gentleman who was a judge in the State court before the war for many years, a lawyer of high character, of talent, indicted for advising an election board as to the construction of the State law. He is indicted as a criminal under this law for merely giving his professional opinion as a lawyer. To-day the authorities of several counties in the State of Florida are under indictment for obeying the law of the State.

Mr. President, the laws which require or authorize or permit courts to visit upon the people such penalties, to arrest them, to hold them under control, to carry them long distances from their homes—the laws under which these things are possible are wrong, they are contrary to the spirit of free government, they are contrary to the powers of the National Government, they are contrary to the common sentiment of justice and right that is in every honest man's bosom, they are the instruments of fraud, of falsehood, and selfish interests, and their instrumentalities are perjury and fraud and falsehood. They punish the innocent and protect the guilty.

Such has been the administration of these laws. The people of the United States, whether they are of the North or of the South, are of a common lineage. They are as brave, as manly, as firm in their purpose to resist oppression in the one part as the other. They hold in their hearts that common sentiment which has made them in every age and upon every theater of the world the controlling power among the nations of the earth. You cannot subdue them by courts which are tainted with fraud or by the administration of the law by forgery and by perjury. You cannot carry the elections in the Southern States by opening the doors of the penitentiaries in the Northern States to the innocent and the oppressed. It only builds up and strengthens the feeling of resistance; not resistance to the National Government, but resistance by constitutional means to laws which are destructive of the rights of the people and of the beneficent administration of the National Government. We have as much interest in the National Government as gentlemen upon the other side. Our fathers as largely if not more largely than theirs contributed to its structure and to its spirit, and inaugurated it and construed it. If here and there there were schools of opinion which differed, it is idle on this account to talk about imputing to the people of the South a purpose of renewing the war or of antagonism to the National Government of the country. We are as proud and have as much reason to be proud of it as the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber, because we inherit from those who build it the national feeling of pride in the work of our forefathers.

The Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] of whom I speak with respect notwithstanding his fierce assaults upon this side of the Chamber, can find better literature in the South to read than an arithmetic which originated in the brain of some extremist, and which no southern man in this Chamber has ever seen or heard of, and of which I have never heard before. He might find it in Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, and the great men of the Revolution. He might follow the language of Mr. Webster, who ascribed the great glory of the Constitution to the Old Dominion, chief above all others. But I shall not proceed further. I heard when the discussion first opened in this Chamber the most fierce assaults made. I heard an imputation upon the southern people that this was the old doctrine of State rights brought to life again, and that those who had failed to destroy the Government by force had come back into power to starve it to death. Mr. President, there is no more connection between State rights and nullification and this proposition to construe the powers of the National Government upon the basis of a free government than there is in any other two opposite things in nature. The doctrine of nullification was a doctrine which gave to a State the right to nullify by public action of the State and its judicial tribunals the laws of the United States, and that doctrine never had a permanent footing in the South. It is disrespectful to the intelligence of the people to accuse Senators upon this side of the Chamber, men of another generation, of connection with that. Does not the public history of the country, does not the public sentiment of the North and of the whole country know that Andrew Jackson, a southern man, put his foot upon that doctrine? Do they not know that he had a large following in the South and that the South was always proud of Andrew Jackson, and proud even of his national attitude upon the force bill, and that up to the very day when the war occurred this sentiment was powerful throughout that portion of the country, and that to-day these ideas of construction of the Constitution prevail as largely there as they do in the North?

Sir, there is no difference between us, unless gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber are intent upon destroying the personal rights of the citizen, unless they claim that the President may use military power without judicial sanction. These laws authorize the use of the military power by the President without the sanction of the courts and without their application by the courts to individual cases; and there is the difference. We insist that there is no power in Congress to prescribe qualifications for voters for members of Congress, nor to authorize the President and his deputy marshals to construe the State laws prescribing such qualifications and punish men for not obeying their construction of them. There is no power in Congress to authorize by law the courts and district attorneys of the United States to convict innocent men of conspiracies under vague and indeterminate laws, and by forced constructions of acts which were never dreamed to be crimes for real or pretended violations of State laws on subjects over which it has no power, nor to try and convict citizens by partial juries upon perjured testimony and sentence them to long terms of imprisonment at hard labor in distant penitentiaries, to the end that by crushing the spirit of the people they may be subdued into acquiesence in the will of a political party.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] delivered a learned speech on the subject of these laws and the use of military power. I will state the difference between him and those upon this side of the Chamber. In the great institutions of education in New England, which are justly famous, where he was educated to be the accomplished man that he is, he was taught from the fountains of the civil law, and he drew his political sustenance from the Roman wolf that fed the builder of Rome rather than from the pure Saxon fountains of English law and liberty. The rescripts of the Roman emperors decided upon the law and executed it; the executive, the military power, decided when and how it was to be executed, and at his will and pleasure executed it by military force; but the English law allows no application to individual rights of public law except under the sanction of a fair and impartial judicial tribunal. It places all this power over the individual citizen, his right not to be arrested, under the judicial power, and guarantees and protects it. But under the civil law the imperial power could arrest at its will and pleasure, and could decide upon the application of the law, and could apply military force in aid of it. The error of the argument of the learned Senator in the great speech which he made here is in the just application of the law, under our Constitution, our system of laws, and the powers of our National Government in their administration of the law, in the execution and enforcement of it.

Mr. President, I heard in the opening of this discussion the Senator from Maine appeal with eloquence and power (as I have heard him since appeal to Mr. Webster) to the memory of Mr. Lincoln as frowning upon the efforts upon this side of the Chamber to secure a repeal of these laws, withering, as he said, with his finger the appearance in these Halls again of southern men, representatives of the Southern States, coming from that portion of the people who either themselves or through others had been engaged in the war. I considered whether it was possible that great man, who has now passed beyond this human life to a higher and better life, and whose name and whose life are the property of humanity and of no party and no particular man, who being dead, as the Senator from Maine says, in the language of Holy Scripture, yet speaketh, but speaketh in his example and in the lessons which he has left behind—I thought whether it was possible that so great a man, who had filled so large a place in the history of his country, had left a legacy of hatred to his countrymen.

I knew from my general knowledge of Mr. Lincoln and of his public attitudes and deliverances that the imputation was unjust; that he was a great man and a magnanimous man; that he was a man who lived up to the full measure of his public duty as he understood it. I turned to his writings to find that his last public utterances upon this earth were far different from the expressions which the Senator from Maine has used here. They were invitations to those who now stand upon this floor to come here. The authority of Mr. Lincoln is not with the Senator from Maine, it is not with any Senator who, either directly or indirectly, by insinuation, by charges of crime, of murder, of assassination, and by allusions to the old doctrines of State rights in any shape or form, keeps alive the strife of the ancient times. It is with the defenders of civil liberty, it is with those people who pray for the restoration of the Government and of the powers of the Government and their perpetuity in good faith. He spoke as follows in the last speech which he delivered, on the 11th of April, 1865:

> We all agree that the seceded States, so called, are out of their proper practical relation with the Union and that the sole object of the Government, civil and military, in regard to those States is to again get them into their proper practical relation. I believe that it is not only possible but in fact easier to do this without deciding or even considering whether those States have ever been out of the Union than with it. Finding themselves safely at home, it would be utterly immaterial whether they had been abroad. Let us all join in doing the acts necessary to restore the proper practical relations between these States and the Union, and each forever after innocently indulge his own opinion whether in doing the acts he brought the States from without into the Union, or only gave them proper assistance, they never having been out of it.

Nor is that utterance inconsistent with his other writings upon this subject. In his letter, on the 21st of November, 1862, he speaks as follows:

> We do not particularly need members of Congress from those States to enable us to get along with legislation here. What we do want is the conclusive evidence that respectable citizens of Louisiana are willing to be members of Congress and to swear to support the Constitution, and that other respectable citizens there are willing to vote for them and send them. To send a parcel of northern men here as Representatives, elected, as would be understood, (and perhaps really so,) at the point of the bayonet, would be—> disgraceful and outrageous, and were I a member of Congress here, I would vote against admitting any such man to a seat.

What? What says Abraham Lincoln, speaking from his tomb in reply to all these discussions?—

This is the precept which he uttered, and no partisan zeal, no partisan malevolence, if such there be, no indiscreet desire of personal ambition or promotion, can misinterpret or stay these words which speak from his tomb and which are a legacy, and a glorious legacy, to his countrymen and to all mankind. Wars and civil commotions and rumors of wars will doubtless occur again as they have done in the past throughout the world, but these words of Abraham Lincoln at the close of the great civil war will re-echo above their strife for all time the sublime gospel of peace and good-will to men.

Mr. President, what can be said of the use of military force in aid of the election law to arrest a man without process, without accusation, without confronting him with his witnesses, without counsel, without trial, without conviction, by a deputy marshal of the United States, and the proposition twice affirmed not only of its rightfulness or its constitutionality but of the necessity in the future of this law and this exercise of military power? Mr. Lincoln said it would be "outrageous and disgraceful to have men here elected by bayonets." I care not whether you call it bayonets or the military organization, or whether it be the organized army of marshals and deputies, so that it be force in one form or force in another form.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer. It has been my effort not to speak in a partisan spirit. I have no desire in what I have said to cast reflections upon any man, either upon the officers of the courts, the judges who preside, or the jurors. I have stated facts, let the blame fall where it may. They may arise from the imperfections of the laws or from other causes. I submit that this is not a government of force. I submit that the Constitution of this National Government says that—

> The Congress shall have power—

> To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Whatever may be said of the practice which has grown up of using the military as a posse and to enforce the laws, the sentences of the courts, the judgments of the courts, and the applications of the law by the judicial tribunals to suppress insurrection and repel invasion there is the great rule of the Constitution.

Wherever a court cannot execute its decrees and its judgments, wherever the customs cannot be collected, wherever the regulations of commerce cannot be enforced, wherever foreign invasion needs to be repelled, the militia are the great arm for the purpose, and although the Army and Navy may be a necessary and a proper instrument to protect its honor and defend the country in war, it was wise to put that provision in the Constitution that Congress shall have power to call out the militia. There is no power given to call out the Army and Navy. That is not mentioned, and why? The militia of every State and of all the States are the people of the United States. To them and to their patriotism is justly confided the execution and the enforcement of the laws. The execution and the enforcement of the laws means the laws as interpreted by the courts in all cases of individual right, whether it is the right to vote or the right to be free from arrest. The execution of the laws means the application to the individual case of the law by the court, and until that is done there is no execution or enforcement of the law, until that is done there can be no care by the President that the laws shall be "faithfully executed," for there can be no law to execute in any given case of individual right except that constitutional law which faithfully executed stands as the ever present sentinel on guard to protect the personal liberty and all the personal rights of each citizen.

Mr. President, this is a government of personal rights. The argument must not be that the great National Government must be increased and strengthened. Its power is vast enough. It is vast enough because it rests upon the patriotism of the people of the country. I deny the proposition that in the section of the country known as the Southern States there is less devotion to the National Constitution, that there is less devotion to the country at large, that there is less patriotism than lives in the breast or inspires the eloquence of any of the distinguished Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. We are not contradistinguished from them and never were by any peculiar doctrines of State rights.

A part of our people and a part of their people maintained the theory of secession, others denied it. The great civil war occurred because there was a revolution in the judgment and minds of a large portion of the people, both North and South, and a portion of them were drawn, in both parts of the country, as all great commotions draw men, and will to the end of time, by the affinities of relationship, of blood, of society, and many men were carried into it who did not share the peculiar constitutional ideas upon the subject held by the leaders of the movement. The idea is unworthy of this Chamber, unworthy of any man, be he a Senator, or in the humbler walks of life, who can see in that great event, the great civil war and the great characters who moved in that exciting drama on both sides, nothing but slavery and secession and views of constitutional right and wrong.

They take a narrow and an unpatriotic view of their country and their countrymen who can see in the great characters who took part in it nothing but wrong on one side and right on the other. It was a great event, and however mournful the bloody tragedy was, it was such as has often occurred upon the theater of the world, and perhaps will occur as long as mankind shall fall below the millennial state of perfection. There were great men upon both sides, heroes, men who sacrificed their lives from a sincere conviction of right as it came to them. Of such men in every age of the world has the great army of martyrs been formed, whose praises the church and the universal heart of man still chants, and will forever chant, and whom all men admire. The child is taught to admire the man who gives his life in unflinching courage for what he thinks is right, and he ought to be admired, because it is the great quality of heroism. It is unworthy and untrue to history and to the better hopes of the world to find fault with the speeches and actions since the war of men who on either side with equal sincerity offered their lives and blood—speeches inviting the youth of the country to new heroisms and future devotion to faith and duty—to find in them occasions to create a belief that they seek again to teach the political theories which led to the separation and to renew the civil strife. It will be a sad day for the country, sir, when the heroism, the high courage, the brave spirit of our people on both sides shall fail to be remembered with respect and honor.

But, Mr. President, I again deny the proposition that there is in that great country, among those seven millions of white people who live beneath the line that formerly divided the free from the slave States, less of Christianity, less of charity, less of virtue, less of patriotism, than there is in any portion of the North. I affirm that no African, no white man, can be either persecuted or oppressed by any man, be he from the North or South, in the presence of the people, without that spontaneous feeling coming to his rescue which animates all that race of people who believe, as the old Saxon proverb expresses, that it is cowardly to "oppress the weak, or to trample upon a defenseless or prostrate foe." It is a feeling as natural to that people as it is to the people of the North, and the aspersion of crime and murder and assassination throughout the country is not the truth. Those who make it are misled, misled by false reports, misled by false statements. Perjury is rife everywhere, and so is falsehood; but the characteristics of our race, the impossibility that seven millions of people should be all or in great part demons, the impossibility that a great party, the democratic party of the North, should be all or in great part traitors to the traditions of our race and our Constitution, all stamp these things as untrue.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 28, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I notice in the reading of the Journal that the statement is made that leave of absence was granted to several members yesterday. I objected at the time the leave was asked to the granting of any leave of absence to members except in cases where it was asked on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that those mentioned in the Journal just read are those only who applied for leave of absence on account of sickness either of the member himself or of some member of his family.

Mr. REAGAN. The RECORD contains the whole list that were applied for yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD contains all the applications, simply as a part of the proceedings, not as a list of those to whom leave was granted.

There being no objection, the Journal, as read, was approved.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. BICKNELL. The Committee on the state of the law in reference to the electoral count for President and Vice-President have directed me to report a bill, and to ask that the bill, with the accompanying report, be printed and recommitted.

Mr. CONGER. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the committee has the right to report at any time.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; let the order be made that it shall not be brought back on a motion to reconsider, and we will meet the other point when it arises.

The bill (H. R. No. 2023) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to presidential elections, and to provide for the counting of the vote for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon, was received, read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the electoral count, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

BINDING OF DOCUMENTS FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. HAZELTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be bound at the Government Printing Office one copy of any public document desired by any member for his personal use.

GEOLOGICAL REPORTS.

Mr. STEVENSON (by request) submitted the following resolutions; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of volume 2 of the geological series of the reports of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, entitled "The Geology of the Henry Mountain," with the necessary illustrations and charts, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 500 for the use of the survey; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 2,000 copies of volume 4 of the geological series of the reports of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, entitled "Geology of the Black Hills of Dakota," with the necessary illustrations and charts, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, and 500 for the use of the Department of the Interior; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

AID TO YELLOW-FEVER SUFFERERS.

Mr. HOUSE. I ask unanimous consent to report back with a favorable recommendation from the Judiciary Committee the joint resolution (H. R. No. 66) legalizing the action of the President and the Secretary of War in sending rations and tents to the yellow-fever sufferers. It is the unanimous recommendation of the committee, and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the action of the President of the United States and the Secretary of War in sending rations and tents to Memphis and other places for the use of the sick during the recent yellow-fever epidemic is hereby legalized as though the same had been expressly authorized by former act of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution which has just been read?

Mr. SAMFORD. I object.

APPROPRIATION FOR POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON gave notice that to-morrow, after the morning hour, he should endeavor to call up the bill for consideration.

CONVERSION OF GOLD INTO SILVER, ETC.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill at this time for reference.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The title is as follows: "A bill (H. R. No. 2024) to convert the gold now or which may hereafter come into the public Treasury into silver, to authorize the issuing of certificates therefor, and for other purposes."

The bill was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. MANNING. I rise to a correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The committee to which it is proposed to refer that bill is authorized to report at any time, and I desire to keep a great many things from going to that committee in order to prevent their reporting them at any time. If it was a bill to convert silver into gold I would have no objection.

Mr. KENNA. Is not the objection too late?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection is too late. The title of the bill had been read and it had been referred, and the Chair had recognized another gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. Then if that rule is to be adopted by the Chair I shall object to anything out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has as much latitude as any gentleman on this floor.

Mr. CONGER. And "the gentleman" expects to have as much.

The SPEAKER. When a bill is read and actually referred to a committee, without objection being made, and the Chair then recognizes another gentleman for the purpose of presenting something for the consideration of the House, a member cannot then rise without any pretense that it was his intention to object to the reference of the bill at the time, and make an objection to the reference.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair did not ask for objection, and the rule says the Chair shall ask for it. I do not wish to correct the Chair in any of his practices, but that is the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to object to anything but the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I simply ask that the Chair, when a proposition requires unanimous consent, may ask for objections, so that my right to object may not be cut off.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not cut the gentleman off. The gentleman did not show his usual speed. [Laughter.]
